Peace, sir! With what peace are we going to deal? Two little nations down in South America today are at grips. They are at grips in a dreadful and awful war, Bolivia and Paraguay. They are both members of the League of Nations, Mr. President. They are both members of the peculiarly sacred and noble institution abroad. They have been fighting for 3 years now. They have decimated their very populations by warfare. What peace are we going to bring? To what peace do we contribute by going into the League or into a part of the League? Who says we will have peace, peace? Only the blind American internationalists who in their anxiety to forget their Americanism in fawning upon other nations, would blithely lead us into any peril.

I want peace, and I yield to no man upon this floor in the desire for peace. I yield to none upon this floor in praying that there shall be no strife among nations or among human beings in the days to come. But where is peace today, and what peace do we gain by going into this Court or by going into the League of Nations? As I shall show, going into the Court will ultimately mean going into the League of Nations just as surely as that night follows day.

"Peace, peace, peace", they cry, when there is no peace. "Peace, peace, peace", they cry, when those for whom they strive do not desire to keep the peace and do not keep the peace and will not keep the peace. To say that our entry into this Court will bring peace to the world is to me the most silly thing that ever was advanced by sensible human beings. If the proponents rest their adhesion to it upon this mystic formula, and apparently they do, there is not a man in this body who understands the English language and follows current events who ought not in contempt to send them out of this Chamber and refuse to accede to their hypocritical cry.

Peace, Mr. President! We have maintained the peace for years and years in this Nation. We have done it with arbitral courts and arbitration treaties. One hundred years of record of our arbitrations will not be met by this particular instrumentality of the League of Nations in 10,000 years. We have never refused to arbitrate a question or a controversy; never! We have arbitrated some that were of extraordinary consequence and that were of transcendent importance to our land and to the world.

Always we have heeded every award that has been made. Never have we violated in any fashion or in any way any award that has been made by our arbitral tribunals. We have accepted all that have been made, and we have preserved our peace, and we have settled our controversies in that way. To say to us now that we can preserve peace and we can be influential in world affairs only by entering a part of the League of Nations, a League of Nations Court, is to deny the truth of the past 100 years in this Nation and in the world, and is to set at naught the remarkable record which has been made by the United States of America in its arbitral relations with other countries.

I am interested in peoples, Mr. President. I care not for those who consider themselves rulers of peoples. What commends the gentleman in the White House to me is that in his philosophy I take it he believes in peoples. Peoples I should like to protect. Peoples' interests I should like to conserve. But I cannot conserve the interests of the people of the United States by sending them into a league or a court where the controlling individuals represent dictatorships, absolutism, tyranny. The state of the world today is that that is exactly what is the fact.

This, sir, is the most unpropitious time to ask this country to betray its long-standing traditional policy. Of all the times that have come to us during the lifetime of the oldest of us, this, sir, is the worst moment in which to ask the United States of America to join this peculiar foreign relationship of the League of Nations.

All Europe is seething now. We do not need to be told that. All Europe sits over a volcano. No one knows when the explosion will occur and when difficulties will happen. If Europeans do know, Mr. President, they are looking forward to the day when with their propaganda they will do what they did with their propaganda in 1917—take this glorious country of ours into a war which with our treasure and blood will win, and then afterwards hate us for the very aid that we rendered them and never forgive us for saving them.

We have had our lesson, Mr. President. How often must we be kicked in order to understand exactly what is transpiring? Mirabeau once said of the distinguished statesman Talleyrand that he could be kicked on one side 17 times and retain his facial composure. That might be. I am wondering if the expectation is with our foreign brethren that they cannot only kick us once, twice, or thrice, but that they can kick us 16 times and we, with the inferiority complex which seems to be a part of some men's character in America, kicked thus we will retain our facial composure and go right ahead to do exactly as they want.

Mr. President, what is transpiring abroad to-day all of us understand. Why go abroad to be a part of them in one fashion or in another? Why, now of all times that the Lord ever gave to us, should we depart from the policy which has been ours ever since we have been a nation, and become a part of the mess that exists over there and put ourselves in a position not where dire results with certainty will happen, but where possibly dire results may happen? Why should America take the chance?

I am interested, sir, in 11,000,000 unemployed Americans. I am interested in the swelling relief rolls all over this land. Do you not think there is room here for the exercise of the highest degree of statesmanship we possess in dealing with our 11,000,000 unemployed Americans and the relief rolls which are swollen out of all bounds now? Do you not think that we can deal with our own for a brief period and forget Europe's controversies, Europe's difficulties, and Europe's wars, into which again they would take us if it were possible for them to do so?

Do you not think, Mr. President, there is work enough here for all of us? Do you not think it tries us to the uttermost to deal with the subjects now before us? Why not deal with them? I detest the idea of standing upon this floor and taking even a brief period upon a subject matter such as is now before us. I resent that I have to turn my mind, little as it is, from those things which seem so important to me in our own domestic economy and deal with some subject which is across the sea and which amounts, it is said, to little, but into which, with all the driving force that there is politically in this country and by a powerful and costly propaganda, they are shoving us at the earliest possible moment.

Why, sir, must we turn aside? Delay in the Court, you say, Mr. President? Yes; delay there has been, delay because those abroad would not accept what the Senate wrote into the Senate's acceptance of the protocol of accession. Delay? What delay is there that will occur in the near future that need affect us in the slightest degree? Why turn aside now from ourselves to go abroad for others? I would rather take care of the trials of American citizens here than indulge in the trials of a foreign court abroad.

This Court, Mr. President, comes, as we know, from the League of Nations. It will not do in the heat of this discussion to say that we are undertaking no obligation concerning that League. If there is anything that the American people have definitely decided and upon which they have rendered their verdict, it is that our country should not enter the League of Nations with or without reservations.

If there is anything that ought to have been definitely in the limbo of the past it is the League of Nations so far as the United States of America is concerned. And yet, sir, it is proposed now to take us in, not only to a part but to an integral part of the League of Nations, and the hope is that we will be taken into the League itself, and when in the League itself, then it will not be difficult for Europe to wreck us.

Authority for this Court, Mr. President, is contained in article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, constituting part I of the Treaty of Versailles. Let me digress to suggest, What is the trouble abroad? What is it that causes the unrest, the unrest which seems to be in every nation over there, and which has been growing constantly and more menacingly with the passage of time? What is it that has caused it? It is the Treaty of Versailles that is maintained there in all its rigors and with all its injustices. What is maintaining it and what is it today that maintains the status quo under that treaty which now nearly every publicist in all the world denounces as a wrong and injustice?

What is it that retains the status quo of that treaty? It is the League of Nations—a part of it the World Court—and it is because that treaty has been continued in inflexibility, with all its harshness, that the difficulties have arisen abroad and that today war is in the air everywhere. It is the Treaty of Versailles; but do Senators think that we would go into this sacred Court and rectify the Treaty of Versailles? Rectify the treaty? Why, those who profited by it would not for an instant tolerate its rectification.

And so these great institutions that we are to be driven into, either with the party whip or to be driven in by propaganda of internationalists or by those pseudo intellectuals who have been driving, driving, driving during the year—these contraptions abroad, foreign in character, are maintaining the status quo of the Versailles Treaty; and they, and they alone, are responsible for the unrest and the inflammable condition that exists abroad now.

The Treaty of Versailles came into force January 10, 1920. It contained provisions that the jurisdiction instituted by the League of Nations is authorized to adjudicate certain disputes. At the second meeting of the Council of the League in February 1920 M. Bourgeois proposed that a committee of League experts be appointed to prepare a draft scheme for the organization of the Court.

I read this because this is the historic statement of how the Court was organized.

In making his report, M. Bourgeois, among other things, pointed out that in order to give full effect to the stipulations contained in the treaty, it was essential that consideration be given without delay to the formation of a court.

The Council appointed an advisory committee of jurists to prepare plans. In the communication inviting the members to serve the Secretary General of the League pointed out that they were to prepare plans for a court, "a most essential part of the organization of the League of Nations." In accepting the invitation the committee assumed the obligation of creating a court in accordance with these instructions.

At the first meeting of the committee at The Hague June 16, 1920, the solidarity between the League of Nations and the proposed Court was emphasized. M. Bourgeois described the two institutions as complementary to each other. M. de Labradell said:

> The new Court, being the judicial organization of the League of Nations, can only be created within this League.

Mr. Root acted in accordance with these views.

On June 22, 1920, Mr. Root said:

> We must first consider that this new Court must be provided as a part of the system of which the League of Nations is part. We cannot accept the invitation of the Council and recommend a plan for a Court which is not going to form a part of that system.

The plan of the committee was referred to the Council. Modifications were made by the Council of the League. The Assembly of the League made other modifications and alterations; and finally a draft statute was presented to the plenary Assembly of the League of Nations and adopted December 13, 1920. The statute of the Court came into being through a resolution passed by the Assembly of the League of Nations providing for a protocol of signature. The signature to the protocol was limited by the League to members of the League and to states mentioned in the annex to the Covenant of the League.

One of the officials of the League, Mr. Hagerup, of Norway, reported the Court's constitution to the Assembly of the League away back in 1920 and used this language:

> You know that a representative of the United States of America, a man of the highest authority, Mr. Elihu Root, took part in the preparation of this constitution. The political party to which he belongs in the United States will soon come into power—

Of course, you realize that this is an old prophecy. [Laughter.]

> The political party to which he belongs in the United States will soon come into power; and though this party has not yet decided to go into the League of Nations, it has proclaimed in a resolution that it is quite prepared to accept the Court. I think I shall be voicing the general sentiments of the Assembly when I say this resolution has within it important results. It is a first step leading to the entrance of the United States into the League.

There is an unbiased and an unprejudiced opinion concerning the Court by one of the gentlemen who was a part of the League of Nations at that time.

Not only that, Mr. President, but there is other evidence as well that makes it perfectly certain what the situation will be after we adopt this resolution.

It will not do to say that nothing will happen, because the propaganda that has been in evidence in the past year or two concerning the Court will be emphasized a hundredfold to go into the League after we shall have gone into the Court, and we shall be pilloried day in and day out by the highly paid propagandists and all their dupes.

Just after the matter concerning the World Court was presented in 1923, a gentleman who was then a friend of mine wrote me concerning it. He is a member of this great organization presided over by Mr. Manley Hudson, that has some title like "The League for the Preservation of Peace", or "The League for the Obtaining of Peace", or something of that sort. It is a big national organization. My correspondent is its regional director in the West and this he wrote me. I asked him at the time if he was willing that I should publish it. He said he was, and I read it then in a speech that was made in 1926. I say that so that the Senate may know that I violate none of the amenities in reading it.

He wrote me:

> MY DEAR JOHNSON: How small the world is, now that electricity has put us all into one room!
> Anyhow, I read in the paper this morning your sarcastic quotation from an alleged "great writer" who could perhaps be identified—"all of which is partly true."
> You are quite right. * * *
> Your strictures on the Hughes-Root-Taft plan to sneak in the back door of the League of Nations are "partly true." Hughes' arguments for it are at most "partly true." The whole scheme is illogical, impractical, insincere, and cowardly. And I am for it. But not for these reasons. You, from your standpoint, will be quite right in being against it. There is no present practical situation calling for action. It is a purely academic, theoretical proposal. There are theoretical arguments for it which are "partly true." You can make others as good against it. I am for it because, as an opportunist, if the Government has not the courage to walk into the League by the front door, I am willing not to approve but to submit to the alternative policy of sneaking in the back door. It will ultimately get us in. This is the final reason why you should be against it and I for it. But in your immediate strictures on the manner of it I agree with you, and am glad if you found my phrase one which you could use, even derisively, as a weapon in the criticism.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the Senator stated, or does he desire to state, the name of the author of the letter he has just read?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes—Chester H. Rowell. He is a publicist of California, and is now one of the editors of the San Francisco Chronicle; and Senators will find, if they look in Mr. Manley Hudson's last book, that he is on the committee that is conducting the campaign.

It may be that Mr. Rowell since then has changed his views. I do not know; I do not care; but I am not of the same opinion that he is. I am not ready to walk into the League by the back door, or the front door, or in any other fashion. I recognize, and of course you do, the danger inherent in what we are doing today, and the possibilities that may transpire.

Away back in 1926 the New York Times printed a dispatch from Europe in which it quoted an incident that occurred when the news came to Geneva or to Paris—I do not know which—concerning our subscribing to the World Court at that time. The dispatch was by Edwin L. James:

> When Premier Briand was asked today to express an opinion on the Senate's favorable vote on the adhesion of the United States to the World Court, he said:
> "It is a beau geste. I hope it is the first step."

"I hope it is the first step"! Of course he knew, just as we knew, that it is the first step. But here the clever English diplomat, Austen Chamberlain, British Foreign Secretary, who was present, interrupted quickly:

> It is better not to say that.

"It is better not to say that!"

And so we have M. Briand saying with great glee, "It is the first step", and Mr. Chamberlain saying, "Hush! It is better not to say that"; but we can know and we can understand just exactly what this means, and what will be done.

Our distinguished brother, the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE], openly avows in the press that he is going to endeavor to take us into the League, and that the State Department already has written for him the resolutions that are essential. That, I take it, is the fact, because it was repeated to him in the committee meeting, and he substantially agreed that it was so. So there we are. We are going into this Court with the knowledge upon the part of those who are the influential members of it and of the League that it is the first false step.

Senators, remember Virgil:

> Facilis descensus Averno.

"Easy is the descent to hell." This is the first step that we are taking in going into the League of Nations, and the propaganda will be wellnigh irresistible once we have taken that step.

There is another reason—and I shall not deal with it at any great length—why it should be impossible for us to enter this so-called "Court." This is no court as we understand courts. This is no institution where merely justice is done judicially between the litigants. This is a court not only with its judicial attributes but with its political attributes, and the latter the more important of the two. This Court, political in character, has demonstrated its political proclivities, and demonstrated them so clearly that nearly the entire press of this Nation, in disillusionment, on the rendition of the decision in the German-Austrian tariff case, spoke of the political character of the Court.

The political character arises, of course, out of advisory opinions. I am not going into them at any length today, because they will be presented upon this floor by another and far abler man, who, having made a study of the subject, can present it so that none can misunderstand. But what are these advisory opinions? Purely political. Judge Cardozo, in a case in New York State, long ago defined what an advisory opinion is. In Two Hundred and Twenty-fourth New York he says, concerning advisory opinions:

> The giving of such opinions is not the exercise of a judicial function.

Then he goes on to explain how in England they are given, and winds up with the fact that they are merely advisory; they are not judicial in character.

So we have decisions that are rendered by this Court political in character; and I am sorry to say that the reservation which protects us from any political activity with nations abroad—the reservation which has been carried on every single solitary resolution of accession to this Court in the past—was defeated before the Foreign Relations Committee, but will come upon this floor again for action by the Senate.

When the decision was rendered in the Austro-German customs union case, various newspapers throughout the land commented on it. I have gathered some of those comments together from those papers which are not unfriendly to the entrance of the United States in the Court. I have taken but a few of the many, but these few I want to read so the Senate will understand that it is dealing here not with a judicial tribunal but with a political tribunal, and it ought not to require any evidence on the part of any man with a head upon his shoulders to understand that fact.

How long do Senators think a man from Italy would sit upon that Court and render a decision against Italy and Mussolini? If Germany had continued to be a member of the League and Germany had a representative upon that Court, how long do Senators think that representative would last with Mr. Hitler if that representative rendered a decision against him?

Take it with every one of those governments where dictatorship exists that have representatives upon the Court—why, of course, human nature will convince us, unless we have forgotten all we know about it, that the men who sit there, representatives of dictators, representatives of those people where angry passions nationally have arisen—those representatives will decide not according to the law, not according to the judicial concepts that we may have; they will decide upon the politics of the situation and upon the politics that affects their particular territory.

Here are some of the views that were expressed by newspapers upon this subject when the German-Austrian decision was made.

[From the Chicago Daily News, Sept. 9, 1931]

THAT WORLD COURT ADVISORY OPINION

Many advocates of entry by this Nation into the International Court of Justice, one must think, are deeply disturbed by the inescapable implications growing out of the advisory opinion given by that tribunal in the Austro-German customs union case. It is painfully manifest that the majority in the 8-to-7 result reached its adverse conclusion by a process of reasoning that is decidedly more political than judicial. * * * The United States Senate has yet to decide whether or not it will accept the World Court protocols approved by the National Executive. And most assuredly neither the Senate nor enlightened public opinion will entertain the idea of adhering to a quasi-judicial tribunal that sacrifices principles of law to political considerations or the fancied interests of a particular power or alliance of powers. Such a court * * * belies its solemn pretensions and betrays instead of upholding the cause of international law and justice.

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

THE TROUBLE WITH THE WORLD COURT

The reaction in this country to the World Court's advisory opinion on the Austro-German customs union has inevitably been unfavorable. Some of the strongest friends of the Court have expressed the greatest disappointment. It could hardly be otherwise. For the line-up of the Court exhibited a depressingly strong political bias, and its decision by an 8-to-7 vote robbed its findings of all weight or pretense to finality. Faced by a major issue, affecting the fundamentals of European organization, the Court failed to function either judicially or effectively.

[From the Chicago Evening Post]

By a vote of 8 to 7, the pact was ruled illegal. Unfortunately for the prestige of the Court, the cleavage was almost wholly on partisan lines, with France and her continental allies swinging the majority vote. Former Secretary of State Kellogg, the American member of the Court, voted with the minority, which held that "It cannot find reasons explaining how the regime would endanger her (Austria's) independence."

World Court skeptics can claim, with some show of justice, that wherever there is a shadow of doubt, politics rather than law dominates the Court's post-war decisions. * * *

From the New York Times, probably the strongest internationalist paper there is in the United States:

A fear that the behavior of the World Court in the matter of the German-Austria customs alliance would be seized upon by American enemies of the Court was justified last week. Washington dispatches related that Senators who have steadily opposed American adhesion to the Court, with or without the Root formula, are prepared to fight the proposal again, and believe that they at last have definite evidence to support their hitherto theoretical argument. This evidence the Senators hold to has been supplied by these circumstances of the World Court's opinion—its political cast; the advance intimation, so that the abandonment of the plan at Geneva by Germany and Austria before the decision was made public could be charged to foreknowledge, and inferences to be gathered from the division among the judges.

Realistic friends of the World Court are agreed that its prestige has been deeply injured. There can be little doubt that the chances of American adhesion have been badly damaged. In the Senate there has been no particular enthusiasm for the Court. The protocols have been kicked about committee rooms. Presidents, while urging them upon the Senate in grave and lofty terms, have been inclined to let things go at that. No real administration effort to press the issue has been made.

Meanwhile the enemies of American adhesion have attacked the advisory-opinion function of the Court from two angles. They have expressed resentment at the prospect that the United States should be given European advice on its sovereign rights, thrusting aside the answer that, by formula, this prospect is excluded. They have contended that in its decision the Court is certain to decide from the political viewpoint when great nations are involved. The recent line-up of the Court has given strength to the latter contention and color to the former. When the World Court divides 8 to 7 on an advisory opinion, sought by the League Council, it is obvious that this opinion is of no value. And when the detail of the division shouts "politics" it is obvious that the charge must lie.

And then in addition to that, the other equally strong internationalist paper, the Baltimore Sun, has this terse expression. It says of the opinion:

The product of partisan judges who voted like ordinary politicians for the boys back home.

And this is the sacrosanct Court that we are to go into in order that we may save the world, bring peace to a war-torn Europe, and ever afterward have happiness among all the peoples of the earth!

The propaganda that has been used in this regard is such that it ought, indeed, to make every man here stand straighter in determining the fact and rendering his decision.

There is one thing that is of extraordinary importance in this Court as well, and that is what the implications are from membership. Before the Committee on Foreign Relations during the hearings appeared Mr. Clark, and he presented a brief in relation to this subject matter that I think is unequalled in all the briefs we have had and all the evidence that has been put before us since this controversy began.

Mr. Clark holds distinctly that behind the Court are the sanctions of the League, and that we may find ourselves, if we sit upon this Court, in the very singular situation finally of being a party to sanctions being imposed upon recalcitrant nations. We understand, of course, what sanctions are. Sanctions, under the League formula, mean any sort of thing that may be done to enforce its conclusions and its decisions. But they mean something else. Oh, you peace-loving gentlemen! Oh, weep your eyes red in telling us about the peace that will come to us from the League of Nations and the Court—you, you are standing here in behalf of League of Nations sanctions in thus doing—sanctions that are the cruelest, the harshest, the most terrible thing in all the horrors of warfare. I would rather see men shot by shell or even killed by poison gas than to have women and children and noncombatants, the weak, sick, and the infirm starved to death, as is the plan of the League of Nations when its decisions may not be carried out.

Sanctions! If there are sanctions behind any decision that this Government may render, then this Government has departed so widely from its old traditional policy that every American ought to hang his head in shame.

Sanctions! Sanctions mean simply starvation, want, hunger, killing the weak, the infirm, the small, the aged, and the young—those who cannot fight. They mean the cruelest thing that there is in all warfare.

Not only does Mr. Clark say that sanctions are behind the decisions of this Court, but Mr. Manley Hudson himself, the great bellwether in all the propaganda in behalf of the League and the Court, says exactly the same thing. Mr. Hudson says, in his work:

The statute fails to make any provision for the enforcement of either interim or final judgments, and the only sanctions behind the Court are those contained in the covenant; and if any State shall fail to abide by a decision it will be for the council of the League to propose what steps shall be taken to give effect thereto.

And the Council of the League may determine that sanctions be employed.

Why, there was talk of sanctions only a little while ago when Japan tore up her treaties and broke her solemn agreements—there was talk of sanctions then. But do you know what they asked and what was wanted? They wanted the United States of America to stand in the van and to be the one first to apply the sanctions to Japan because of Japan's actions in Manchuria and in China. And be it said to the good sense of our people, we declined to be the cat's-paw, although our Secretary of State apparently marched ahead for the purpose of going the route. And, of course, he was immediately deserted by the great members of the League.

I do not want any son of mine or any grandson sent over to China in a war between China and Japan. And I have very strong feelings concerning the attitude of the Japanese in relation to treaties and in relation to what they have recently done, but God deliver us from the day when by joining a league, or joining a court, this country of ours will be party to levying sanctions upon a harmless part of a particular nation or bring starvation to those who are least able to bear it. I want none of mine in it. Why take the risk? How ironical to join for the sake of peace—the peace of sanctions.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, how does the Senator mean to spell that word "peace"? They have an $11,000,000,000 piece over there now belonging to this country.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was going to speak of that in just a moment.

One of the arguments which was advanced by my distinguished friend from Arkansas the other day—an argument with which I was not unsympathetic—was that we should not stand aside, accept something from the Court, and then refuse to pay our proportion of expenses or to do that which we ought to do. He called it a "sponger" argument, and as a sponger argument he held it up to ridicule and to obloquy. I would not say that he was not right concerning that sponger argument; but just look for a moment at the other side of the picture. You want to take our own revered Uncle Sam where? Where spongers upon him sit in judgment upon him, and not only the spongers upon him but those who made and solemnly signed treaties. Every one of the spongers got our money as they begged it. Every one of them wept in gratitude. Every one promised in treaties to repay. Every nation owing us save Finland violated their solemn written promises and repudiated their plighted faith. Now we are to sit with spongers, with welchers, and with repudiators of treaties in the sacred name of peace. What a scene!

Talk to me of a sponger argument! Take our country into a gathering of that sort, and where are we? I have heard in my time of a debtor submitting himself to the judgment of his creditors, but I never yet have heard of a creditor submitting himself to the judgment of his debtors, and that is what we might wander into in the course of our peregrinations down this internationalist bypath. In their gyroscopic somnambulism, these gentlemen, pseudointellectuals, who think they are beyond ken and that no man is able to comprehend them, talk in this lordly fashion. They tell us, "Just take your country into the leadership of the world", never for an instant thinking of the older nations that have lived all their lives with their glorious history behind them and are proud of their traditions. What do they think when they hear us prating about leading the world and leading them? They must smile with their tongues in their cheeks as they devise the methods for utilizing our idiocy.

Some of our people have an inferiority complex in dealing with foreign nations; that is something remarked upon all over the world, and we cannot avoid remarking upon it here. There seems to be a segment of the American population that spends its time in its anxiety to obtain a foreign decoration. I recall when I was in Paris one distinguished American waiting there for 2 long months to get a decoration from France.

I feel friendly toward every nation; I have no prejudices, no hatreds—none whatever—or bias at all concerning a single one; I recognize their right to do just as they please; but I demand my right to have my country do just as it pleases. I do not want my country shoved across the water, so that it may be—not will be, but that it may be—under the power or the authority of those who are abroad. Senators all know how those abroad think and feel toward us; there is no use amplifying that subject; but now is the most unpropitious time that was ever suggested for us to join the League Court; now is the worst of all the periods when this question has been before us to do what is asked of us.

I wish that I could prevail upon the Members of the Senate to secure the statement of Mr. Reuben Clark which will be found in the Foreign Relations Committee hearings, part II thereof, and read what he says, and also read his brief. It is a remarkable document prepared by a very able man. He has the advantage of not only being a very great lawyer but he has also been a diplomat, and he has been connected with the State Department in days gone by. If Senators will read that brief, if they will follow at all his argument, they will be in a better frame of mind to do the thing that ought to be done this day.

Now, in order to ease us into the World Court, we are repeatedly told that we need not submit any questions unless we want to and that we can go in and be a part of the Court and submit questions or not, just as we choose. Like my friend from Arkansas, in the case of the sponger argument, I cannot fathom entirely that kind of argument. It is neither appealing nor persuasive with me. It was phrased a little differently by one of our Presidents when he said that it—the Court—is a convenient instrumentality to which you may go but to which you cannot be brought.

I do not care for instrumentalities of that sort. If this country is going to join any organization abroad, let us go in not with the idea that it is an instrumentality to which we may go but to which we cannot be brought; let us go in with our heads high, though we hate it; let us go in as Americans manfully to play our part. To say to me that we are going into an organization as to which we may go in if we want or stay out if we desire is an argument that has neither force nor weight nor logic nor persuasiveness behind it. If we are going to act in the fashion that we should, if we are going to stay out altogether, the argument may be more or less effective with certain individuals. But that is not the purpose of this particular organization, and very shortly after we get in we would find the purposes presented by the organization vastly different from what we assumed them to be under an argument of that kind.

Mr. President, the resolution of accession presents a rather strange situation. I am not going to present it at any length particularly today, but I should like to commend it to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas and to the Members who are here. I am not clear as to what was done with the reservations that were supposed to be attached to the resolution of accession to the Court. Let me recall to you the historical situation. We have a protocol dated 1920; that is the original protocol of admission to the Court. We have then a protocol, or call it such, concerning amendments to the Court; and then we have the protocol presented at the time the Root formula was submitted here. I am unable to determine for myself, I am not clear in respect to the matter whether or not the first four reservations are preserved by the protocols that are thus accepted by us. It is true that we accepted on one occasion the protocol with our reservations; it is true that thereafter there was a gathering of the clans at Geneva out of which came the Root protocol, but the Root protocol does not traverse the first 4 reservations, only 1 of which, in my opinion, is of very great importance. I may be entirely in error in this, and we will take it up as we proceed with the argument hereafter, but there is no place that I am able to discover where there has been an acceptance of the reservations which were adopted by the Senate which will be authentically official in the days to come. As I say, I express that thought in interrogative form to the Senator from Arkansas and we may take it up subsequently during the debate.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. In referring to the reservations, is the Senator from California referring to the five reservations incorporated in what we usually call the Swanson resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; and let me call attention to the fact that not only were there 5 reservations but there were 2 resolutions which were quite as important, quite as necessary for the protection of our country as the reservations. Indeed, the only one of the reservations that I deemed of consequence was the first one saying that we had no connection with the League of Nations or the Treaty of Versailles.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask where do the five reservations appear in any document which the foreign nations have approved? They have referred to these reservations, but in what document do the five reservations appear as having been specifically approved by the foreign nations?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly what I was referring to.

Mr. ROBINSON. The reservations, of course, appear in the Senate resolution of advice and consent of 1926. In the protocol of accession, which is now under consideration, in the first paragraph, as I remember, it is stated that the signatories accept the five reservations.

Mr. BORAH. That is true, Mr. President; they accept them by reference, but the reservations which were presented to the foreign nations in 1926 were rejected; they refused to accept them. The only reference made to them thereafter is in the resolution to which the Senator adverts, where they refer to the four reservations.

Mr. ROBINSON. The five reservations.

Mr. BORAH. The five reservations. They say that these five reservations are approved upon the terms and conditions herein specified. I think that that is not an approval of those five reservations. It is an approval of them with modifications, which are therein stated. I do not see, if the Senator from Arkansas will permit me and if the Senator from California will also indulge me, why those five reservations should not be incorporated in the resolution of ratification.

Mr. ROBINSON. The only reason that I can see is that it is wholly unnecessary to do so, the reservations having been set forth in the original resolution of the Senate and having been accepted by the signatories to the protocols. They are in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to take the time of the Senator from California further.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all right. I am very glad to yield because I was seeking information when I asked the question of the Senator from Arkansas. I wanted his opinion upon it. I have looked at the matter since, and I am very doubtful whether we can hold that the reference is sufficient unless we can find that the reservations are a part of some official document in the League of Nations.

Mr. ROBINSON. They are a part, as I have already stated, of the original resolution of advice and consent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to, which I sincerely hope he will consider before we finally vote upon this question, is that the reservations in the resolution to which he has referred are accepted upon the terms and conditions "herein stated."

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that fully.

Mr. BORAH. "The terms and conditions herein stated" may and do modify, in my judgment, those reservations, and I do not see why they should not be incorporated in full, and then accepted as herein provided.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. If the Senator from California will yield for a moment, I desire to say that I think in the protocol which is called the protocol of revision and acceptance there will be found not only the wording but also the spirit of all five of the reservations, and in the protocol of revision it will be found that the reservations themselves have been incorporated into the fundamental statutes of the Court itself, that the protocol of revision sets up the present rules under which the Court operates, and those rules include the spirit and provisions of the first four reservations.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator say that in the amendments made to the statute, reservation 1, occurs—

> That such adherence shall not be taken to involve any legal relation on the part of the United States to the League of Nations or the assumption of any obligations by the United States under the Treaty of Versailles.

Does that occur?

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. That reservation is accepted and is understood.

Mr. JOHNSON. Pardon me; I understood the Senator to say it was in the amendment to the statute.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me further for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. To my mind, the question is easily answered. There is not the slightest occasion for uncertainty about the matter.

The Senate of the United States in 1926 adopted a resolution advising and consenting to the protocol. It attached certain reservations—five in number. When the other signatories considered the subject, there was finally incorporated in the protocol, which is now before the Senate, as I said a moment ago, the following statement:

> ARTICLE 1. The States signatory to the said protocol accept the special conditions attached by the United States in the five reservations mentioned above to its adherence to the said protocol upon the terms and conditions set out in the following articles.

Then articles 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 follow, but all of those articles with probably one exception are intended to give practical effect to the five reservations and do not in any particular modify the reservations or change their effect. They give force to them, as clearly appears from reading the language.

As I said yesterday in my remarks upon the subject, a question did arise touching that part of the terms and conditions which had application to reservation no. 5, but any doubt that may exist as to that is removed by the provisions of the pending resolution. When we adopt the resolution, if we do so, we will have agreed to the protocol in which they have accepted the five reservations, and that will conclude the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas another question?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I would agree with the Senator entirely in his contention if it were not for the clause which reads "upon the terms and conditions herein."

Mr. ROBINSON. The expressed terms and conditions, when we consider the language of the terms and conditions, do not in any wise modify the reservations. They do not change their legal or practical effect. The principal object of the terms and conditions set forth is to make certain that the United States will have notice of an application for an advisory opinion and be afforded the opportunity if interested to prevent the request for the opinion going forward from the Council or the Assembly, and then also be afforded the opportunity, if the request does go forward, to prevent the entertainment of the request for the opinion and the rendition of an advisory opinion by the Court touching a subject in which it has or claims an interest.

The terms and conditions referred to facilitate and give effect to the reservation of the United States denying the Court's jurisdiction to consider, without the consent of the United States, any request for an advisory opinion touching a question or dispute in which the United States has an interest.

To my mind the question raised by the Senator from Idaho presents not the slightest difficulty.

Mr. BORAH. I did not raise it. The Senator from California raised the question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I beg the Senator's pardon—the question raised by the Senator from California. When we agree to this resolution, if we do so, and when the ratifications are exchanged, all five reservations will be in force and effect. There can be no doubt of that, because one of the protocols which we are considering expressly makes that declaration.

Another protocol, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] relates to the statute of revision, and the revisions that it carries are intended to give effect to the reservations which the United States has made, which reservations have been accepted by the signatories.

I thank the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I appreciate what the Senator has said, and I invited it. I am very glad to have his explanation. I am not clear in the matter myself, but I shall take it up at some future time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask further what effect have the two resolutions which were adopted at the same time with the five reservations? I am wondering why they do not appear as reservations instead of resolutions. When reference is made to the approval, are those resolutions approved?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not understand that the resolutions to which the Senator from Nebraska refers are agreed to in the protocol. I do not understand that to be the case, because the language of the protocol is that the special terms and conditions set forth in the five reservations are accepted and there is no mention of the resolutions that I recall. I shall look further into the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. There is none. I have made examination of the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. The first refers to conditions, my recollection is, and the second refers to reservations. It is rather a strange thing, but until the recent meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee I had never heard of any rejection or objection to the two resolutions originally adopted by the Senate. I think the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Idaho are in like position in that regard.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. JOHNSON. Surely.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Arkansas is right when he says that the protocol as now before us makes no reference whatever to those resolutions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Quite so.

Mr. NORRIS. But it does refer to the five reservations. The resolutions are really reservations just the same as the others.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is quite so; but what I was trying to say to the Senator was that up to the discussion which has just transpired in the Foreign Relations Committee I never assumed and I never thought there was the slightest objection to the two resolutions.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us get the parliamentary situation. Suppose we approve the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas, then will it not follow as a matter of fact that the two resolutions originally adopted by the Senate are not approved?

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes; because we have had that contest.

Mr. NORRIS. We would have to pass them again at this time?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think so, because the contest has arisen on them now. Both of them were presented in the Foreign Relations Committee and both were defeated.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think there is no doubt about that. Since the acceptance by the signatories of the proposal of the United States does not include the resolutions to which the Senator from Nebraska refers, but specifically includes the five reservations attached to our resolution of advice and consent, the resolutions are not in the protocol.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is obvious now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. It has been obvious to me from the beginning.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did the Senator from Arkansas ever hear these discussed since they were presented? Was not the only discussion carried on about them after the Root formula and the five reservations?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that is entirely true, and in my judgment that circumstance is responsive to very sound considerations affecting the subject matter. Of course this is a matter of argument, and it is a matter about which the Senator from California and I probably would not be in accord.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is quite so.

Mr. ROBINSON. We are in accord upon a great many subjects, but we have never been able to reach an agreement about anything I can recall touching the World Court.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the Senator is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON. It is hardly with the hope of convincing him at this juncture that I have offered any suggestions.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was trying to straighten the thing out so we would know just "where we are at." That is the reason why I made the inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. I repeat what I said in the Foreign Relations Committee, that the Moses resolution, or whatever it may be termed, and the two resolutions which have been specifically mentioned by the Senator from California are not incorporated in my resolution of advice and consent. If my resolution be agreed to in the form in which it is presented they will not be a part of the arrangement.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is perfectly clear.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. When the resolution of ratification which was adopted in 1926 was completed it included the two resolutions about which we have been talking—that is, the resolutions with reference to abandoning the traditional policy of the United States and the action of the Senate with reference to submitting treaties. But when the conference ended at Geneva, which was attended by Mr. Root and which resulted in the Root-Hurst protocol being returned to the United States, they were eliminated and they have not since been considered as a part of that protocol. That is one thing in the Root-Hurst protocol about which there was no ambiguity.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in order that we may clear this matter slightly, let me recall to the Senate that originally 5 reservations were adopted by the Senate and 2 resolutions which in effect are reservations as well. The dispute arose neither concerning the first 4 reservations nor concerning the 2 resolutions. The dispute related along to the fifth reservation and a part of that fifth reservation. Until the other day, as I said a moment ago, I had assumed that there was no objection upon the part of foreign countries to the two resolutions. I have never heard any discussion or any suggestion concerning the nonacceptance of any part of the reservation of accession originally passed by the Senate save concerning a part of reservation no. 5. There has been no allusion, so far as I know there has been no suggestion of hostility by those who met abroad with Root to the two resolutions.

Let me read the two resolutions; and the first time that I knew of any objection on the part of anybody to these two resolutions was when we met in the Foreign Relations Committee the other day. These are the two resolutions:

Resolved further, As a part of this act of ratification that the United States approve the protocol and statute hereinabove mentioned, with the understanding that recourse to the Permanent Court of International Justice for the settlement of differences between the United States and any other state or states can be had only by agreement thereto through general or special treaties concluded between the parties in dispute.

That was no. 1. It was intended originally, when that resolution was adopted, to maintain our hand, if we could, upon the disputes that were presented by the United States of America, and wield the power that the United States Senate had ever wielded in regard to treaties or in regard to matters of that sort.

The last one, the second resolution, was as follows:

Resolved further, That adherence to the said protocol and statute hereby approved shall not be so construed as to require the United States to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign state; nor shall adherence to the said protocol and statute be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

That reservation has been defeated by the Foreign Relations Committee. It will come upon the floor here, so I shall not attempt to argue it at this time; but I want to put it, if I can, in the mind of every man upon this floor, and I want to ask him whether he is ready to say by his vote that the traditional policy of the American Republic is finally repudiated by the United States Senate upon political questions that arise abroad, or that the policy in respect to domestic questions is abrogated or changed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. In order that there may be no misunderstanding of the position taken by the committee, and waiving argument of the matter at this time, deferring it until the question is actually before the Senate, I wish to state that, in my judgment, no question of abandoning our traditional policies, or of submitting to the Court of International Justice purely domestic questions, is involved in the consideration of this resolution of adherence; that the adoption of such a resolution would be merely confusing, would add nothing to the position of the United States, and would accomplish no wholesome end; and that by rejecting such a resolution we do not abandon any policy that we have, or any purpose that we have.

I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am forced to disagree with the distinguished Senator from Arkansas in that regard. This resolution has been attached to every foreign treaty of conference, organization, and the like into which the United States has ever entered. Even in 1909, upon the treaty relating to the Hague Court, that reservation was appended by the Senate. Twice, I think, while this matter has been pending before the Senate of the United States that reservation has been adopted.

It may be that the question never would arise. That may be correct. I am not going to gainsay it; but this is one of the protective reservations that has ever been deemed essential by the Senate, and to eliminate it at this time in connection with this particular tribunal would leave implications that would be most unfortunate for the United States of America.

I do not argue this matter now, because doubtless it will be the subject of an extended debate in this body shortly. The reservation has been presented by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and he undoubtedly will take the laboring oar in presenting his views upon it. Then all of us, I assume, will likewise express ours. So I leave the subject now with the simple statement that here is a reservation which preserves the United States in its traditional policy not to be involved in any political questions abroad, which the United States Senate apparently will decline to sanction. Never in the course of the history of the United States Senate has it ever been denied before. When the argument comes up we shall ascertain whether or not it is to be denied for the first time in 1935.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves that part of the discussion?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is a very curious disagreement respecting the statement of the situation as submitted by the Senator from Arkansas and the record in respect to the status of these two resolutions.

It is true that the protocol of accession says that our adherence is acknowledged subject to the five reservations. It is equally true that the official document of the United States Senate respecting the World Court defines both of these resolutions as being the third and fourth paragraphs of the fifth reservation. I show the Senator from California the official publication, and I show him the identification of the resolution which he has just read; and the official identification is that it is the fourth paragraph of the fifth reservation.

If that be the official identification, why is it that the paragraph which accepts the five reservations in the protocol of accession does not accept the resolutions as well?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, to what document is the Senator referring?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senate's official compilation of World Court material, published on December 16, 1931. It assumes to quote from the Executive Journal of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is clear to my mind that the two resolutions—the one relating to traditional policies and the other relating to the manner of referring questions to the Court—are not a part of the fifth reservation. They were never so treated by the Senate or by the Foreign Relations Committee; and the document to which the Senator refers is not an official document in the sense in which he attempts to describe it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield for one moment further?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield. If Senators will pardon me for saying so, I think this discussion is informative, and that it is a good idea to have it at this time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume that I have a right to rely upon the compilation made by the Secretary of the Senate, and I assume that it is accurate when it purports to quote the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. From what page of the document is the Senator reading?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Page 37 of the document. It assumes to quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and quotes the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as describing in this language the final resolution which the Senator from California has just read:

The fourth and last paragraph of reservation no. 5 was read, as follows:

Therefore, so far as our official Senate identification is concerned, the resolution to which the Senator refers is part of the reservation; and when the protocol of accession accepts the reservations, and then we in turn decline to reinsert the fifth reservation, I submit that it is a most amazing paradox.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to add a word to what the Senator from Michigan says.

The Senator from Michigan refers to this document and says that it refers to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I do not think that necessarily makes it evidence; but it also refers to the Executive Journal, which is an evidence of what the Senate has done—the Executive Journal, volume 64, pages 541 and 542.

If the Journal of the Senate would show that this resolution is a part of reservation no. 5, I think any court would have to accept it as part of the record; and if this is a correct copy of the Journal, it would be a part of reservation no. 5.

Mr. JOHNSON. One of the indicia of what the Senator says is the fact that no living soul ever heard of an objection to those two reservations until the other day.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As bearing further upon the Senator's latest observation, this particular paragraph of the fifth reservation was submitted by itself for a vote in the Senate on January 26, 1926, and it was unanimously approved.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I know that. The statement to that effect will be found in the RECORD.

Mr. President, to resume briefly, I want to say that I am very glad to have these discussions. The fact of the matter is that all of us have been engrossed in our daily tasks. They are no small tasks, too. All of the Senators, I am sure, feel just as I do in that regard. Naturally, it has been a difficult thing to twist our minds back over the period of 12 years in a contest that was of great moment, but that lasted for a long time, and had many, many details; and I think the more we can thrash this thing out upon the floor in the fashion that we have done today, the better it is for the Senate and the more information will be derived, because, sir, I believe there are men in the Senate who want information upon the subject and are very glad to have it.

As the President said this morning, this is not a political question. It is not a political question with Members of this body, I take it. I know it is not a political question with me. This is one of the questions where men may disagree, it is true; but it is one of the questions where a man may do all in his power under all circumstances, and go forward, no matter what the consequences may be, in behalf of an honest opinion. I am ready to do that, and I have done it for 16 years in the past.

In 1919, when we began the contest on the League of Nations, there were few to do us honor, and few to listen to our arguments. We went from State to State then presenting our cause; and although the great newspapers of the country supported the League, and every paid propagandist in the country was on his feet and on the rostrum in behalf of the League, when the common people—who, thank God! are in the majority yet in this Nation—understood the issue, there was no question about the result.

It is just people in whom I am interested. I cannot, of course, convince a metropolitan daily or a professor from a particular college. Of course, I cannot convince a gentleman who receives a salary of considerable extent per week or per month for propagandizing concerning this matter. But I should like again in the strength that I had in 1919 and 1920—I should like again to present this question and the question of our going into Europe—I should like to present it to just the common people of America, and I would do it with an absolute confidence that they would again agree that we should never join with a European organization that might take us across the water and again embroil us in Europe's wars.

Mr. President, this is not the first time that this country of ours has had to consider what would be done under certain circumstances in regard to its foreign policy. It is a little more than 100 years ago when with sanctified utterance the endeavor was made by the Czar Alexander to bring to the world his great Holy Alliance. His language was not different from that we heard during the fight upon the League of Nations or that we hear now about this World Court—a court so futile in its operations that it is really unable to decide anything except a political question.

The Czar Alexander, one of the great monarchs of the time, and one of those who was a conqueror of the great Frenchman—the Czar Alexander in language as florid as any that has been dripped on us, told of the aims of his Holy Alliance, and I desire to read a word or two that you may see how history repeats itself, and so that you may see how even in the young days of the Republic men then stood their ground and fought their fight, fought it for their country, and announced their doctrine, which has been the doctrine from that time unto this.

The Czar and his fellow sovereigns forming the Holy Alliance sent forth their pronunciamento to the world as this:

> Conformably to the words of the Holy Scriptures, which command all men to consider each other as brethren, the three contracting Monarchs will remain united by the bonds of a true and indissoluble fraternity. Considering each other as fellow countrymen, they will on all occasions and in all places render each other aid and assistance; toward their subjects and armies, they will extend a fatherly care and protection, leading them (in the same spirit of fraternity with which they are themselves animated) to protect religion, peace, and justice.

I will not read the rest of the pronunciamento, but it is composed in the same diction and follows along the same high plane with the same high purpose. Then forming, as they did, the Holy Alliance, the victorious monarchs started in the holy name of peace to make plain to the people of the world how never again should war trouble, how men should ever walk upright, and all should be brothers. Unctuous in their liberality, they promised subjects happiness and prosperity. They went on with the Holy Alliance until finally England, canny England, began to understand, and England ultimately withdrew.

That is what we are doing today, you know, bringing peace and happiness to all our people by joining a warlike aggregation across the Atlantic Ocean! The Holy Alliance continued its activities until Metternich, wily politician and clever statesman, finally wrought his will within that alliance and its cornerstone became legitimacy. Then when people had revolted in Spain and a wretch who had been put upon the throne had fled, the Holy Alliance, in the name of "religion, peace, and justice" sent its troops to Spain, destroyed freedom, and put him back upon the throne, and thereafter the Holy Alliance became simply the engine of tyranny and an object of contempt and ridicule.

During the period of time when the Holy Alliance was embracing the world and telling the world just exactly how it should act, and how it would carry on and keep its peoples free and happy and contented and prosperous, its advocates came to America for the purpose of engaging our Monroe and our Adams, and getting our accession to their particular tribunal. Oh, ye people of Massachusetts! let me read what Mr. Emerson said in that day. Let me state to you that during that period when the Holy Alliance was asking the accession of the United States of America the Massachusetts Peace Society passed its resolutions, demanding that we join this particular tribunal for the sake of maintaining peace throughout the world. Emerson then indulged in just a brief remark:

> Aloof from contagion during the long progress of their decline, America hath ample interval to lay deep and solid foundations for the greatness of the New World.
> Let the young American withdraw his eyes from all but his own country, and try, if he can, to find employment there * * * In this age the despots of Europe are engaged in the common cause of tightening the bonds of monarchy about the thriving liberties and the laws of men; and the unprivileged orders, the bulk of human society, gasping for breath beneath their chains, and darting impatient glances toward the free institutions of other countries. To America, therefore, monarchs look with apprehension, and the people with hope.

Today what have you in Europe? What is there there? Monarchies? Worse. You have the absolutism in Italy, you have the peculiar sort of government in Germany; you have the strange crew now cheerfully engaged in executions in Russia. All along the line Europe has its separate affairs to solve. It has its kind of people—better than we, perhaps, but not like us. There they are governing in their own fashion. They have in the sacred name of peace their League and their Court. Let them have them; but do not make us become a part.

Think of the things that have passed in the long days gone by in the history of our country when it was young, and when it was weak. During that period is when here we gave birth to the Monroe Doctrine. You will realize, I have no doubt, the difficulties that confronted the small Government during that period, and why it was that we endeavored to keep ourselves free and keep ourselves clear of foreign entanglements. I never can forget the language of your Massachusetts man, Mr. Adams, during that period of time. Mr. Adams instructed Middleton, July 1820:

> The political system of the United States is * * * essentially extra-European. To stand in firm and cautious independence in all entanglements in the European system has been a cardinal point of their policy from the peace of 1783 to this day. * * *
> Yet in proportion as the importance of the United States as one of the members of the general society of civilized nations increases in the eyes of the others, the difficulties of maintaining this system and the temptations to depart from it increase and multiply. * * *

And that is what troubles us. The temptations increase and multiply during these days with us to depart from that which has been our only safe anchorage during all the days of our existence.

Our intellectuals, you know—these pseudointellectuals who are so perfectly certain they are right, and who feel very assured of their mentality with the cherished views that they hold, who are impervious to any knowledge of anything that smacks of reality—they go about all over the land trying to muddle us in theories that are theirs, to have us change the Government under which we have lived so long. Mr. Adams, clear headed and American, said the possibilities:

> Should renewed overtures on this subject be made—

Said Mr. Adams to Mr. Middleton—

Russia would be answered that the organization of our Government is such as not to admit of our acceding formally to that compact. But it may be added that the President, while approving of its final principles and thoroughly convinced of the benevolent and virtuous motives which led to the conception and presided at the formation of this system, by the Emperor Alexander, believes that the United States will more effectually contribute to the great and sublime objects for which it was concluded by abstaining from formal participation in it. As a general declaration of principles, the United States not only give their hearty assent to the articles of the Holy Alliance, but they will be among the most earnest and conscientious in observing them.

As a general principle I will give my hearty assent to the doctrines of the League of Nations and the World Court so long as they are practiced and so long as they are developed in Europe for European ills, but we are different from those people abroad—can you not understand that? We have not only national prejudices in this country of ours, but we have difficulties which arise within us from those who come from abroad. The other day we saw accounts of a number of American citizens going over to the Saar to vote. I resent the idea that American citizens should do that. But it illustrates better than any words of mine could how difficulties with us multiply, and are different from those difficulties that exist abroad.

Here we are supposed to have a melting pot. It has not melted as yet, and we are obliged to concede it. Here we have men and women from every clime on the face of the earth—men and women who perfectly naturally have their hot passions for the territory from which they come. You may take an oath and say you abjure it all, but it is in the very nature of man that he should love the spot in which he was born, and you cannot eradicate it from his mind or from his soul. And in this country, with these various elements, we have the troubles not that they have alone but we have the added troubles of having every one of these racial groups interested, passionately interested, in what goes on in the country from which they came. We are different from these people abroad. We are told every day, Oh, distance has been annihilated and means of communication are such that we are all brought closer together, and therefore we ought all to form one great world nation and one great world community. A distinguished gentleman in the State Department, Mr. Wallace McClure, has been issuing some releases of late. Senators may get them if they desire. I understand he is a most excellent gentleman and is the assistant to Mr. Sayre, who has been here among us. Mr. McClure has been releasing some speeches that he has made which are so grandiose in character that I sometimes fear he is afflicted with delusions of grandeur. It is said that all distance is annihilated and all communications bring us right together, and therefore it is time for us to go abroad.

God gave us two great oceans that put us here upon this hemisphere. Distance has been annihilated abroad, it is true. There is only the shadowy boundary line between France and Germany, but that shadowy boundary line, across which these two Nations are brought face to face constantly, in a generation—aye, in a century—cannot because of proximity remove and cannot obliterate the national passions that exist or remove the enmities of centuries.

We are different over here. Why go abroad? What reason is there that we should alter our system in the slightest degree and go abroad to enter a Court or a League of Nations or any other organization of any other kind or character there where political questions may be decided and political questions determined?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator has noticed the publicity given to the fact that England has balanced her budget and is preparing to reduce her taxes?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. While at the same time sending a note to America, that has not a balanced Budget, but one of increasing debt, that she is unable to pay the interest on her debt to us, that note coming along about the same time we are invited into this benevolent participation?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; it is a very interesting thing. I do not want to get into a discussion of the debts at the moment. I do not know whether or not Senators remember the arguments on the League of Nations. They were founded all upon a moral obligation that we had—a moral obligation. We were so great and so beneficent, so beautiful and so good that we had the moral obligation to lead all the rest of the world, and we were going to do it by virtue of going into the League of Nations and putting our resources and our men at the disposal of that particular aggregation. Today it is the same thing. A moral obligation rests upon us to go into this Court. Do you not realize, Mr. President, when they say to us now, to minimize what we are doing, that we will not need to do anything once we get in because we do not need to submit to a decision unless we want to and we do not need to have a decision acted upon at all unless we wish—do you not realize that once we get in we have gone in and the moral obligation will be preached to us day in and day out until we will be called a "welcher" if we do not do the job in the fashion in which the internationalists wish us to do it? Once we get in we are gone. That is all there is to it. So if there be any danger at all, out we should keep and out we should remain.

Mr. President, let us look, too, at another thing which is important in this case. If there were anything like a Republican Party in this body, I would address myself to it in that regard, but I address myself to everybody here in that respect. To the Root protocol is annexed practically the latter part of the fifth reservation which was adopted by the Senate. What it provides is that if the United States has or claims an interest over the objection of the United States a case cannot be heard. That is, in substance, what is provided; I do not quote it with accuracy but I quote the substance of it. Who is to determine whether or not a case shall be heard? Who is to decide it? The cry is rampant throughout the land today to destroy the Senate as a part of the treaty-making power. All the good people who want to take us abroad and who want to make us citizens of the world instead of citizens of this country, all of them in unison cry, "Take from the Senate of the United States its power in making treaties; strip it of the right and leave them naught to say respecting treaties." By this reservation the Senate is deprived practically of the right to say aught concerning what is a treaty. It is a delegation of power that is quite as dangerous as delegations against which there has been some outcry of late. A portion of the reservation that is attached to the Root formula therefore may be effective under certain conditions, or it may not be effective at all. Where do you suppose we will land if the State Department, with the international views of our present State Department—and I speak in terms of high commendation in some respects of the present Secretary of State—where do you think we will land if that Department has the determination of whether or not an objection shall be made to the hearing of a case by people abroad? Once we have advisory opinions relating to the United States of America, political as they are, and as we know they are, and as has been admitted today—once we have advisory opinions rendered in matters in which the United States is interested, the whole fabric that has been built up since we were a nation goes crumbling to the ground, and so it is that we ought not to take the initial step.

I read a little while ago the instructions of Adams to Middleton. By the way, Mr. Canning, who was running the affairs of England at the time, made some remarks about the Holy Alliance when finally he quit it. He said:

What was the influence which we had had in the counsels of the alliance? We protested at Laybach; we remonstrated at Verona. Our protest was treated as waste paper; our remonstrances mingled with the air.

If they get us over there at Geneva into the Court, our protests will be treated as so much waste paper and our remonstrances will be mingled with the air.

On November 19, 1823, during an interview with Addington, Mr. Adams, while suggesting the difficulties that Great Britain might find in breaking her former close relations with her allies, declared that the United States would decline to attend any conference on South America, unless the new republics were also invited to be present. No

Congress, he maintained, could give Europe a right "to stretch the arm of power across the Atlantic." In the strongest terms, he reflected upon the pretensions of the congressional system:

That was the Czar Alexander system under the Holy Alliance. Mr. Adams said:

The very atmosphere of such an assembly must be considered by this Government as infected—and unfit for their plenipotentiary to breathe in. The ground I wish to take—is that of earnest remonstrance against the interference of the European powers by force in South America, but to disclaim all interference on our part with Europe.

As the Holy Alliance has come to edify and instruct us with their principles—

He wrote in reference to Poletica's Mission of Exhortation—it is due in candor to them and in justice to ourselves to return the compliment.

Oh, of course, that was a long time ago. The man who uttered those words long since passed away. Naturally his words and the words of those who were his contemporaries are regarded now by our internationalists not only with contempt but with some degree of contumely. We have been teaching some of our people that patriotism is a sin and that no man should speak his love of country and none should engage in any eulogium upon his Nation.

There is a grand old man who wrote the fifth reservation, John Bassett Moore, undoubtedly the most astute international lawyer who lives and the most learned. He has filled many roles, always with credit to himself and always with honor to his country. He it was, in conjunction with the late Senator Walsh and former Senator Swanson, who prepared the fifth reservation, but, you will remember, Mr. President, how the difficulties mounted and multiplied over that reservation in the days that followed. Just think for a moment and then see if you cannot doubt some of the intellectuals who believe now with such certainty that they can direct world affairs.

When the reservation was presented it was overwhelmingly adopted by this body. It went abroad, where it met with some objection in some particulars; and then the most astute lawyer that probably has existed in this generation was sent abroad by one of our Presidents in order to write a new fifth reservation and bring back something that was just as good but a little different, and he did it. He brought it back, and then all the intellectuals accepted the Root formula.

I was belabored, as every other man who was opposed to the Root formula was belabored all over this land, bludgeoned by the newspapers who believed in internationalism and wanted to take us abroad. Oh, it was claimed, the Rood formula answered every question, every single, solitary objection; it had to be accepted in 15 seconds by the recalcitrant Senators; it ought to be adopted without a single solitary moment of hesitation. All over the land the cry went up, and those individuals who had not approved of Mr. Root's substitution for the work of the Senate of the United States were abused in a fashion that has seldom been met with. Yet what has happened? Finally we are justified in the opposition we made to the Root reservation, for today the proponents of the World Court annex to the Root formula the fifth reservation which the Senate had adopted and which the Root formula sought to destroy.

So I say to you, Mr. President, if we do with too much confidence in what our internationalists and our pseudointellectuals insist upon as the appropriate method of procedure, remember what has transpired in regard to this single reservation and look at least a little skeptically and a little doubtfully upon what they say.

Mr. President, I know what the situation is, and I know it full well. I am very glad that the Lord gave me the ability to stand upon my feet and to fight my fight, no matter what was in store. I am very glad that today, on an occasion such as this, I can present my views, even inadequately and in sketchy fashion, as I have, concerning a matter in which I think my country is involved.

I wish I had the power and the eloquence—oh, I long for that which some men have been given in such profusion, I long for that facility of expression and that power which could arouse in the Members of the Senate the same thoughts that I have regarding our country and regarding its future. We are all alike in our designs, none of us would do aught that would injure our Republic; none of us desires to do that which in the days to come we may repent; the only question is, How can they see this thing; and the only appeal that I can make to Senators is to see it with your own eyes, to probe it with your minds and your own heads; decide it according to the God-given mentality you have, and decide it as you believe to be the right. If you believe in that right, stand up to it no matter what the consequences may be, for it is your country that calls to you today. This is no little matter with which we deal; this is no trivial policy upon which we are asked to act; this is the American policy which comes to us today. It is the American policy that means either that which we love in the future or that which we may fear in the future. We can be, and we ought to be, Americans. The only appeal that I make is, for the love of God, without fear, let us be just Americans!

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the resolution of adherence.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am sure the Senate is not ready to proceed to vote now upon the questions involved in the proposed amendment. I suggest that the Executive Calendar be called. There is further debate upon the World Court which cannot be concluded today.

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first order of business on the Executive Calendar will be stated.

PUBLIC PRINTER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of August E. Giegengack, of New York, to be Public Printer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think there should be a call of the Senate inasmuch as there has been a change in the program for the afternoon. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adams | Copeland | Lewis | Russell |
| Austin | Costigan | Logan | Schall |
| Bachman | Couzens | Lonergan | Schwellenbach |
| Bailey | Cutting | Long | Sheppard |
| Bankhead | Davis | McCarran | Shipstead |
| Barkley | Dickinson | McGill | Smith |
| Bilbo | Dieterich | McNary | Steiwer |
| Black | Donahey | Maloney | Thomas, Okla. |
| Bone | Duffy | Metcalf | Thomas, Utah |
| Borah | Fletcher | Minton | Townsend |
| Brown | Gerry | Moore | Trammell |
| Bulkley | Glass | Murphy | Truman |
| Bulow | Gore | Murray | Vandenberg |
| Burke | Hale | Neely | Van Nuys |
| Byrd | Harrison | Norris | Wagner |
| Byrnes | Hastings | O'Mahoney | Walsh |
| Capper | Hatch | Pittman | Wheeler |
| Caraway | Hayden | Pope | White |
| Clark | Johnson | Radcliffe | |
| Connally | Keyes | Reynolds | |
| Coolidge | King | Robinson | |

Mr. LEWIS. I have announced previously the absence of several Senators, giving the reasons. I repeat that announcement for the present roll call.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] is absent attending the funeral of his colleague's wife.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The clerk will state the next order of business on the Executive Calendar.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Ferdinand Pecora, of New York, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Robert E. Healy, of Vermont, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James M. Landis, of Massachusetts, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George C. Mathews, of Wisconsin, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph P. Kennedy, of New York, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD

The legislative clerk read the name of Henry E. Hoagland, of Ohio, to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James A. Moffett, of New York, to be Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration for a term of 4 years from June 30, 1934.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination go over for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

That completes the Executive Calendar.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Senate resume legislative session.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 17, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we praise Thee that Thou art a Being clothed with infinite power, succoring the weak, the ignorant, and the sinful. Blessed Lord, Thou art the inspiration that lifts man from forbidding conditions and makes him superior to circumstances which deteriorate character. Heavenly Father, do Thou restrain and shape our desires and fit us for the image of true and divine manhood. May our heart throbs be true to Thee and our fellow men. Preserve our Speaker and the Members of this Congress in the freshness of joy and hope and in the promise of life. Inspire every cherished impulse, every true feeling, every right ideal, and every high conception. In the name of our Lord and Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, January 14, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 54

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN, late a Representative from the State of New York.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that in compliance with the foregoing resolution the Vice President had appointed as said committee Mr. COPELAND and Mr. WAGNER.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. Con. Res. 4. Concurrent resolution providing for the acceptance by the United States of the statutes of Caesar Rodney and John M. Clayton, and extending the thanks of Congress to the State of Delaware for the contribution of such statues.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mrs. GREENWAY appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order today, Calendar Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

FAILURE OF THE RECOVERY PROGRAM

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech, somewhat political, that I made over the radio last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me on January 15 over the National Broadcasting System:

Nothing could more accurately define the situation today than the old Latin proverb, "Lack of confidence is not the result of difficulties; difficulties come from lack of confidence."

There can be no denial of the fact that we are finishing the second year of the Roosevelt administration facing serious economic difficulties. Nor can there be any denial of the equally obvious fact that these difficulties have constantly become more serious during the past 18 months.

Eleven and one-half million industrial wage earners are in the ranks of the unemployed—one-half million more than a year ago.

The true and final test of recovery is the number of men put back to work. Judged by this test, the experiments of the present administration are condemned.

Approximately 19,000,000 individuals are dependent in whole or in part upon public relief, an increase of 5,000,000 over a year ago. The cost of relief borne by the Federal Government has been constantly increasing. A year ago, according to the latest report of the Federal Relief Administration, it was expending $70,000,000 a month for public relief. This has increased to $170,000,000—more than double.

In addition, during the last 6 months we have expended $200,000,000 on the C. C. C. camps, an increase of $47,000,000 over last year. The Department of Agriculture has expended, strictly for relief purposes wholly apart from its agricultural adjustment benefits, $70,000,000.

This increase in unemployment and the number dependent upon public relief has taken place in face of the fact that during the last 18 months this administration has expended $11,000,000,000 on its so-called "recovery program." In making this lavish expenditure, it has been expending $2.15 for every $1 it collected, has run our Government $6,000,000,000 "in the hole", and increased our interest-bearing public debt by $7,000,000,000, until today it is higher than it was at the close of the World War.

In addition to having unlimited funds at its disposal, the administration has had equally unlimited power, by reason of the last Congress making the office of the Chief Executive a dictatorship, under the plea of emergency, and at the request of the President.

The failure of the so-called "recovery program" cannot, therefore, be charged to lack of money or lack of authority. It has failed because it ran counter to every economic law, to every tradition of the American people, to common sense and human nature.

The administration has preached recovery but practiced destruction. It urged private industry to go ahead and take up the slack of unemployment. It then made such revival impossible, first by putting the Federal Government in competition with private industry, and, second, by taking from private industry all voice in the management of its affairs through various instruments of Federal regimentation.

It deliberately, and without cause, abandoned the gold standard, debased our currency, and started tinkering with our monetary system, making it impossible to tell what the value of the dollar will be next month or in 6 months.

It has persisted in a program of wild expenditures, uncontrolled and nonaudited, until, according to President Roosevelt's own definition prior to election, the credit of our Nation is threatened and economic recovery made impossible.

By reason of these expenditures, plus its flirtation with fiat-money advocates in order to gain votes, the administration has pushed the Government to the very door of wild inflation—which would wreck our entire economic structure and render all investments valueless.

Under such circumstances, prudent men do not make long-time investments or plan new expenditures. Industry dares not expand. It dares not tie up too much money in raw material. Business dares not carry large inventories. It must live from hand to mouth. Capital goes into hiding. Those with savings must husband their every resource. In other words, our entire economic system has been paralyzed by the experimental policies of the new deal.

The thing which more vitally concerns business and industry today is the refusal of the Roosevelt administration to profit by its mistakes—indeed, its refusal to admit it has made mistakes or that its 2-year experimental program is a near failure.

Another shock to business is that the administration has even abandoned the hope it entertained a year ago of eventually balancing our Budget. Apparently it has also abandoned any real desire to do so, for it possesses both the power and the machinery to accomplish that purpose if it so willed.

Yet, in the face of this record, the administration is asking Congress for the additional colossal sum of $4,000,000,000 purely for further experiments, without any known, definite plan, insofar as the public or Congress is aware, for its expenditure.

The administration is asking that the President be permitted this sum of money without any restrictions being imposed upon the purposes or methods of its expenditure. Such a request is contrary not only to all precedents, regardless of whether the Republicans or Democrats control Congress, but it is contrary to the entire theory of our Government, which places the control of the raising and expenditure of public funds in the hands of the legislative branch of the Government.

Before Congress appropriates any such sum, it should be furnished a fairly definite program as to the objects upon which the money is to be spent. Surely the administration must have such a program to have arrived at that sum. Certainly the Congress and the people are entitled to be informed of that program.

If, on the other hand, the administration has no definite plans for the expenditure of an additional $4,000,000,000 for so-called "emergency purposes" after nearly 2 years of planning, then it should not be granted such a sum of money.

The logical conclusion is that notwithstanding the President's statement at the opening of Congress of his desire to cooperate with the Congress, he is not willing to cooperate. He is not willing to trust the members of his own party, for they are in absolute control of both branches of Congress. And by this same action he indicates he is not willing to trust the taxpayers with advance information as to how he intends to expend another $4,000,000,000 of their money.

Is this money to be expended this year or next? Is it to be expended putting the Government still further in competitive private business? If so, in what lines is the Government going to compete? Does anyone believe this threat held over American business is going to put any more men back on private pay rolls? I for one certainly do not think so. We should also remember that next year there is a Presidential campaign and election, and there is always the possibility that the expenditure of immense Federal funds in close congressional districts and States might easily play an even more important part in the decision of that election than it played in the decision in the congressional elections of last November.

The administration still refuses to attempt to stabilize the value of the American dollar.

It announces its purpose of making permanent the multitude of alphabetical bureaus, brought into being by Executive order and which have existed only to harass private enterprise.

It persists in its policy of using public works as a political weapon to reward its friends and punish its enemies, as witness the recent refusal of the Public Works Administrator, Mr. Ickes, to allocate funds to a $43,000,000 project for New York City until and unless Robert Moses, recently Republican candidate for Governor of New York, resigns from his position in the New York City administration. This demand has been made in order to satisfy a personal and political grudge upon the part of the Roosevelt administration.

The administration announces its determination to continue its policy of negotiating in secret tariff agreements with other countries, a policy which leaves every industry in this country in doubt as to whether or not it will be compelled to share its already meager domestic market with cutthroat foreign competition.

All these things breed fear instead of confidence, tear down instead of build up, increase the confusion and uncertainty that exist on every hand, and render economic recovery absolutely impossible.

In closing I want to state, with all the emphasis possible, the first and most important step in our recovery program is the return to confidence of the people in the Federal Government. That can be best obtained by a definite statement upon the part of the administration declaring: First, it will immediately stabilize our currency at home and abroad; second, it will withdraw from the competitive field of honestly conducted private business and industry; and, third, it will reduce its bureaucratic expenditures and insist upon an honestly balanced budget.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter received by me from the Ohio Chamber of Commerce, urging me to vote against the immediate cash payment of the soldiers' bonus, together with my reply, and, possibly, a few additional remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I here insert the letter mentioned from the Ohio Chamber of Commerce:

OHIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Columbus, Ohio, January 14, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ASHBROOK: I am justified by official action taken by the Ohio Chamber of Commerce to urge that you should vote against the proposed payment of the soldiers' bonus at this time. In fact, there are very good reasons why this bonus should not be paid until its normal maturity date.

Payment at this time means payment of $1,400,000,000 more than the present value of the certificates, and, of course, to that extent, is that much more added burden on the taxpayers and the people of the Nation.

A leaflet recently issued by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, entitled "Service Men's Bonus", sets forth the issue quite clearly. As stated above, the official position of the Ohio Chamber of Commerce justifies me in transmitting this leaflet to you. You will find it enclosed.

Trusting our declarations may have your careful consideration when this matter is up for vote, I am,

Very truly yours,

GEORGE B. CHANDLER, Secretary.

And here, Mr. Speaker, is my reply to the above letter, which plainly states what I expect to do when the question of the immediate cash payment of the soldiers' bonus comes before this body:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1935.

Mr. GEORGE B. CHANDLER,
Secretary Ohio Chamber of Commerce,
Huntington Bank Building, Columbus, Ohio.

DEAR MR. CHANDLER: Your letter of the 14th advising me that the Chamber of Commerce of Ohio, by official action, urges me to vote against the present payment of the soldiers' bonus because the present payment would mean $1,400,000,000 more than the present value of the certificates and would add that much more burden to the taxpayers. Your figures may be correct but mean nothing to me, and I say this as a more than average taxpayer.

I wonder how many members of the chamber of commerce saw real service in the World War. Certainly not many. I am so much opposed to war I am almost, but not quite, a pacifist. I was a Member of Congress during the World War period and voted for a declaration of war, much against my convictions, a thing I will never do again if it means political exile for me. Nothing short of an invasion of our shores by a foreign enemy would again prompt me to vote for a declaration of war. But war was declared—those who suffered should be reimbursed as far as it is possible and those who benefited should foot the bill. But that is not the question at hand.

Everyone of mature years who did not enter the World War remained at home and received high wages. I remember paying 15-year-old boys $3 per day for common labor, and ordinary mechanics from $1 to $1.50 per hour during the war. Those who slept on their own feather beds, enjoyed mother's home cooking, and the comforts of the family fireside, far from bullets and deadly gas, had the opportunity at least, free from danger and amid happy and comfortable environment, to make much more than was paid the World War soldiers, including the so-called "bonus." The stay-at-homes—I am not criticizing them—reaped the benefits, if there is such a thing as a benefit resulting from war, while the boys who were sent to training camps and overseas received $1 and $1.25 per day plus the bonus, which many now begrudge. The boys who remained at home were in as good physical condition when the war was over as they were when war was declared.

Many thousands of the boys who entered the service met untimely death, their young lives were blotted out, not to make the world safe for democracy but to pay higher dividends to munitions makers and selfish greed. I had a nephew, a bright, young college student, who now sleeps in France. Many more thousands returned to their homes maimed and diseased for life. Very few who saw war service are today in as fit condition as when the strong arm of the Government was placed upon their shoulders and they were bid to leave home, mother and friends, abandon pursuing their chosen life pursuits, then in the forming, and take up arms in the defense of their country.

And yet you, through the Ohio Chamber of Commerce, ask me to vote against the immediate payment of the bonus. With high regard for the purposes and usefulness of your organization, I wish to plainly, yet respectfully, advise you that, entertaining the feeling that I do for the soldier boys, I would consider myself a very poor American citizen to vote against the immediate payment of the bonus.

I not only expect to vote for its immediate payment, but to vote to pass it over the President's veto, if it should be vetoed. I yield to none in my admiration of our great President, but on this question I am not in accord. I so declared myself before the primary election and before the general election and will not betray my constituents by voting as indicated.

I served in Congress for 14 years and during that service was dubbed "Pension Bill" because of my activity on behalf of the soldiers and their dependents. I was involuntarily permitted to remain at home for 14 years and then returned for what may be a brief stay, but a leopard was never known to change his coat, and so long as I am here there will be no doubt about how and where I stand when the rights of those who risked their lives that the rich might grow richer, for a time, is concerned.

Frankly, and briefly, I am strong for the soldiers' bonus and against the Economy Act so far as it has deprived thousands of soldiers and their dependents of the admitted debt due them.

Trusting that I have made my position on this very important question clear, I am with high esteem,

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I appeared in the House restaurant yesterday and endeavored to get a glass of wine, and I was denied this privilege.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we who fought against prohibition for a great many years feel a great deal of chagrin when we go down to the House restaurant and are thus proscribed. Practically the whole country, and soon the whole country, will be able to get all the refreshment of this kind it desires, and yet we, the Members of the House, cannot be trusted—shall I put it that way—we cannot be trusted for fear there may be some intemperance developed among some of our Members. I call the attention of the House and, particularly, the attention of the members of the Committee on Accounts to the fact that this situation should be remedied, and the Members of the House should have the right to go into the House restaurant and imbibe temperately. It is ridiculous to object to the use of liquor refreshments in one restaurant for fear of intemperance among our Members. That is an unwarranted aspersion upon all of us. I resent it.

We can procure beer and ale; why not wine?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from New York claims the right to have his glass of wine in the House restaurant, surely I would be entitled to the right to have a glass of straight Scotch whisky if I wanted it.

Mr. CELLER. Why not?

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman would seek to turn the Capitol of the United States into a common barroom.

Mr. CELLER. Oh, the gentleman knows that is not so. The gentleman can be trusted to act decently and honorably.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the gentleman has not stated a question of privilege, either of the House or of an individual Member.

Mr. CELLER. I submit that I have.

Mr. BLANTON. We have done without barrooms in this Capitol for many years; and never again are we going to open any more barrooms in this Capitol.

Mr. CELLER. It seems rather anomalous with the demise of prohibition, resulting in the opening up of restaurants in the District where wines and liquors may be served, that the dining room of the Members must function without the use of wine. You permit beer, which has upward of 4 percent by volume of alcohol, and ale, which has upward of 6 percent by volume of alcohol. There seems to be no good reason in my mind why wine should not be permitted, particularly dry wines like clarets, sauternes, chablis, and the various Rhine-wine types whose alcoholic percentages vary from 9 to 13 percent by volume. These are usually table wines, and the grapes from which they are crushed grow in California primarily. Other States, however, supply very fine wines of this character, notably New York, Ohio, Missouri, New Jersey, and Delaware. Then there is the very palatable wine made from the scuppernong grape, which grows in many Southern States.

If stronger wines are wanted, you could arrange for the serving of fortified wines, like port, sherry, muscatel, angelica, and madeira. These wines are usually California wines, although some of them are grown in New York, New Jersey, and Ohio. Fortified wines have an alcoholic percentage upward of 22 percent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman has not stated a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Rule IX of the House provides as follows:

> Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of Members, individually, in their representative capacity only.

The Chair fails to see where the gentleman has raised a question of personal privilege under the rule, and therefore sustains the point of order.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague from California, Mr. JOHN STEVEN MCGROARTY, introduced a moment ago the much-heralded Townsend old-age revolving pension plan.

This plan has been ridiculed and criticized by the press and by various individuals, and I am now giving formal notice that next week I am going to ask for ample time to explain the Townsend plan to the Members of the Congress. I believe I shall be in position to advance a mode of procedure whereby this old-age pension can be paid to the aged citizens of our Nation with not more than a 2-percent sales tax.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Briefly.

Mr. BLANTON. If all of the 435 Members of this House would join the Ways and Means Committee and spend 6 months devising every means of taxation known to tax experts, we could not raise enough money to pay $200 a month to over 8,000,000 people over 60 years of age. This proposed $24,000,000,000 per year pension plan to civilians is so ridiculously absurd that I am surprised that the gentleman from California would espouse it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I hope my friend the distinguished gentleman from Texas will assist me so that I may obtain ample time to expound my ideas. It is my belief that if he will listen to my argument, he will not consider as absurd the plan which I outline. We heard a question of personal privilege propounded here a moment ago by a Member who protested the refusal of the House restaurant to serve him wine with his meals. In my opinion, it behooves us as Members of the Congress to think of the millions and millions of aged citizens of our country to whom we should extend the wine of hope and adequate and proper old-age pensions, and if the House will give me time next week I feel confident that I can present this question in an understandable and practical manner.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of a reasonable, sane, old-age pension. But the so-called "Townsend plan" of paying $24,000,000,000 per year is utterly absurd, for neither this Government nor any other could ever raise that sum of money.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. I assume the gentleman is in favor of the Townsend bill, and I would ask the gentleman if he would not rather favor a tax on wealth than a sales tax to finance any old-age pension bill?

Mr. HOEPPEL. If the gentleman will help me to get sufficient time, I am confident that I can answer his question satisfactorily.

Mr. TRUAX. I will not object to the gentleman's request.

THE BLACK M'KELLAR ACT

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on section 15 of what is known as the "Black-McKellar Law", relating to the Postal Air Mail Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of effecting economies in the Federal Government, the Seventy-third Congress enacted the Black-McKellar bill revising the air-mail laws. Among other provisions of this act, and with a view to creating competitive bidding that would bring about reduced air-mail rates, was included section 15 of the bill making it unlawful for air mail contractors, competing on parallel routes, to merge or to enter into any agreement, expressed or implied, which may result in common control or ownership. Designed to prevent monopolistic abuse, the worthy objective of this provision cannot be honestly questioned, but under the stress of the closing weeks of that Congress we failed to exercise proper and rational foresight with regard to the consequences which would follow from this specific provision of the bill. Despite its intended benefits, the application of this law will exercise a decided hardship upon certain sections of our country and particularly the entire Pacific coast.

Section 15 of the Black-McKellar Act will handicap the constructive advance in air transportation America has been proud to maintain as the world's leader, and particularly will it cripple this advance along the Pacific coast. The interpretation placed upon this section of the act compels any transcontinental air line to divest itself of any connection with the Pacific Coast Air Line which operates between Seattle, Wash., and San Diego, Calif. As a matter of fact, however, the Pacific Coast Air Line is in no sense competitive with transcontinental air service. It so happens that it is owned and controlled by a company operating transcontinental air services as a feeder to this service, and it functions as a necessary public carrier for the people of that section of our country.

Always progressive, and marked from the very beginning as a people of pioneering spirit, the people of the Pacific coast have been air conscious for a long number of years. The necessity for efficient, prompt communication and transportation up and down the Pacific coast has grown with the years. Many of our cities have expended large sums in the development and upkeep of modern airports. The city of San Francisco has spent millions of dollars in the building and maintenance of one of the most efficient and successful airports in the world. The need for it is best illustrated by the fact that in recent years, and during the present depression, its use has been so great as to make it self-sustaining. Other communities up and down that 1,200 miles of coastline have also spent additional millions to bring this valuable service to them. What is true of the Pacific coast is undoubtedly also true of other sections of the United States comprising large groups of our population.

It is surely inconsistent with good public policy for the Congress of the United States to permit this section of the act to become effective and thus materially handicap, if not completely destroy this service. The value of efficient airports, particularly along our coastlines, as strategic points for military defense of the country cannot be overestimated. Every endeavor should be put forth by the Congress to encourage their development. In no sense should obstructions be placed in their way.

The act does not contemplate to repel the marked advance of air transportation in the United States, but its application does. In order that this great injustice may not be done to large groups of our people, I urge upon the Congress the necessity for immediate remedial legislation to overcome the obstacle created by this section 15, of the Black-McKellar Act, to the continued and consistent development of aviation in every section of our Nation.

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL SERVICE FOR MEMBERS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have today introduced a resolution to provide for additional clerical service for Members of the House during the present session of Congress.

Due to the extreme burden of clerical work placed upon the Members through veterans' cases and various other matters that come to us I believe we require the same proportion of clerical service that is accorded to the other branch of Congress. To meet this I am introducing a resolution providing for additional clerical service to Members of the House during the present session.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. DIES. Is it not a fact that in another body they are providing for another assistant to their secretarial force?

Mr. WHITE. I am not informed as to that.

Mr. DIES. It is a fact.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is the proposed additional clerical service to take care of the distribution of patronage that is coming to Members?

Mr. WHITE. It is not; it is to take care of the veterans' cases and the additional work placed upon Members of the House due to many increased activities of the National Government.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. Did not the gentleman's party in their platform promise the electorate that they stood for economy in government, and does he not think it is time to abolish the bureaus and cut down expenses?

Mr. WHITE. This is economy for the Government, because it is to enable the Members to conduct their business in a normal and expeditious manner. The Members of the House who have been here for some time are well aware of the fact that the work incident to the conduct of a congressional office has increased tenfold. Due to the great expansion of the National Government's activities, we must deal with all branches of the Departments in representing the people of our district. The people are taking an interest in their Government as never before, with the result that we are being flooded with thousands of letters and inquiries; and, unless we are provided with additional help, it will be impossible for us to give our constituents the service they deserve and have a right to demand.

HISTORY OF THE TARIFF IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by my colleague, Mr. TREADWAY, delivered to the Wesleyan University on the history of tariff legislation in this country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I am inserting an address delivered by my colleague from Massachusetts, Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY, to the students of government in Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn., on the history of tariff legislation in this country.

HISTORY OF THE TARIFF IN THE UNITED STATES

In addition to being a fruitful source of revenue, the tariff is one of the principal means of regulating the industrial and commercial life of a nation in relation to that of other countries. Thus, while financial exigencies generally are an important consideration in the imposition of customs duties, economic and social factors also exercise a major contributing influence. This has been the experience of our own country from colonial times to the present.

COLONIAL TARIFFS

The colonial tariffs were chiefly for revenue, but at the same time a number of protective laws were enacted. In those days, while there were no manufacturing industries to protect, each colony encouraged its own agriculture, either by prohibiting the importation of commodities from other colonies, or by imposing tariff duties. Thus, Massachusetts in 1652 excluded all imports of malt, wheat, barley, biscuit, beef, meal, and flour. Virginia, on the other hand, prohibited the importation of tobacco, especially from North Carolina, and Maryland discriminated against liquors from Pennsylvania.

With the outbreak of the Revolution, each independent State prohibited all commercial intercourse with Great Britain, and that with all other countries was virtually cut off by the hostilities. Foreign trade being at a standstill, the people were compelled to provide for their own wants from the resources at hand. The Revolution, therefore, had a profound effect upon the early economic development of the country. Manufactures, which by British mandate had been prohibited in the Colonies, were stimulated behind an absolute wall of protection, and the foundations were thus laid for many of the industries which subsequently were fostered under protective tariffs.

TARIFFS UNDER THE ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION

At the close of the Revolution, the newly formed United States of America began its existence under the Articles of Confederation; and although the States bound themselves to perpetual union, they did not yield their independence but reserved to themselves so many important functions that the General Government was weak and ineffectual. Among the powers reserved was that of levying customs duties. As a result, each State could frame a tariff to suit itself and make the duties apply not only to foreign merchandise but to that from other States of the Confederation as well.

The debts incurred during the war and the difficulty of collecting taxes caused most of the States gradually to reimpose their tariff duties. At first, the rates were low and applied mostly to luxuries and articles thought to be harmful.

In the South, tariffs were used chiefly as a source of revenue, but the Northern States gradually advanced and extended their levies until their tariff schedules were quite comprehensive, embracing protective as well as revenue duties. In this connection, it is interesting to note some of the preambles to the early statutes. For example, the New Hampshire law of March 4, 1786, begins as follows:

"That the laying duties on articles, the produce or manufacture of foreign countries, will not only produce a considerable revenue to the State, but will tend to encourage the manufacture of many articles within the same."

Similarly, a Rhode Island statute of 1785 is entitled:

"An act for laying additional duties on certain enumerated articles for encouraging the manufacture of them within this State, and the United States of America."

A Massachusetts statute of 1786 prohibiting the importation of some 58 articles of common use, apparently had protection as its sole object, because no revenue could be derived thereunder. It began with the following preamble:

"And whereas it is the duty of every people, blessed with a fruitful soil, and a redundancy of raw materials, to give all due encouragement to the agriculture and manufactures of their own country."

The National Government, being precluded from imposing customs duties, was forced to seek its revenue by requisitions upon the States, which for the most part went unheeded. Congress twice sought from the States the authority to levy a general revenue duty of 5 percent, applying to all imports, but each time a single State prevented the plan from going into operation.

Congress was then led to consider the question of vesting the General Government with greater power over the States, and in 1787 passed a resolution recommending a Constitutional Convention for the purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation. Under the new Constitution subsequently adopted, the States were specifically prohibited from levying customs duties, either upon foreign merchandise or that from the other States. Instead, the Federal Government was given the exclusive power to impose duties on imports, thus assuring it an independent source of revenue. As a consequence of the mandatory free exchange of goods between the States, the establishment of a great home market was made possible.

TARIFFS UNDER THE CONSTITUTION: THE ACT OF 1789

Congress was not long in making use of this new power. Very soon after its first meeting, in April 1789, James Madison offered a resolution calling for the adoption of a general revenue tariff. As a counterproposal, Mr. Fitzsimons, of Pennsylvania, who was the first Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, moved that Congress enact a tariff measure along the lines of the Pennsylvania law, which not only would furnish the needed revenue but at the same time give encouragement to domestic industries.

With these two proposals before it, Congress adopted the Fitzsimons plan. The House of Representatives then proceeded in Committee of the Whole to consider the details of the measure, with Members from each State championing duties on the products of their respective sections.

The debate on the bill disclosed the antagonistic interests of the North and South with regard to protection. The Southern States sought an unrestricted commerce that would promote a market for their agricultural products and permit the purchase abroad of manufactured products, for the production of which conditions in the South were not favorable.

The resulting Tariff Act of 1789 was the first general legislation enacted by Congress under the Constitution. It began with the following preamble:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers that duties be paid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported."

The act imposed specific duties on more than 30 kinds of commodities, and laid ad valorem duties on certain others ranging from 7½ to 15 percent. A duty of 5 percent was imposed on all articles not specifically enumerated.

Between 1789 and the War of 1812, 13 tariff measures were enacted for both revenue and protective purposes, with the trend of the rates steadily upward. Only a year after the first tariff act was passed, it was superseded by another law increasing some of the old duties and imposing certain new ones. In May 1792 another general tariff revision occurred, in which increases were made in many of the rates.

Two years later the existing ad valorem duties on certain articles were increased by a flat 5 percent, and under the act of May 13, 1800, an additional 2½ percent was imposed on all articles then subject to a 10-percent duty. The act of 1804 imposed an additional 2½-percent duty on all articles on which an ad valorem duty was then imposed. As a result of this cumulative legislation, most of the ad valorem rates were increased to 17½ percent. Many of the specific duties also were increased during this period.

The appearance in 1791 of Alexander Hamilton's Report on Manufactures undoubtedly exercised a great influence over the post-Revolutionary tariff legislation. This report was prepared by Hamilton as Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of Congress calling for suggestions and plans "for the encouragement and promotion of such manufactures as will tend to render the United States independent of other nations."

THE WAR OF 1812

In 1812, all tariff duties were doubled to furnish the revenue with which to carry on the war with Great Britain. An embargo act also was passed prohibiting all commercial intercourse with the enemy. During the period of the war, manufacturing expanded materially, just as it had during the Revolution. The country was again thrown upon its own resources and was compelled to manufacture for its own needs. This new demand for manufactures was met mainly in New England, where much of the capital formerly engaged in shipping was temporarily idle.

With the ratification of the Treaty of Ghent in 1815, terminating the war, Congress was faced with the problem not only of increasing the revenues to discharge the war debts but with protecting the new manufacturing industries which, with the resumption of European competition, would face ruin. One week after the treaty was ratified, the House of Representatives called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to report a complete plan of duties. His report was not made, however, until a year later, and in the meantime Congress extended the double war duties until June 30, 1816, after which time a duty of 42 percent was to be imposed in addition to that existing on articles prior to July 1812. This was equivalent to a reduction of 29 percent in the war duties.

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1816

In 1816, Congress adopted a general tariff measure which conformed, in the main, with the plan submitted by Secretary of the Treasury Dallas. Articles which could be produced at home were taxed sufficiently high to exclude foreign competition; those which were only partially supplied by domestic producers were given a lower rate; and those which could not be produced in the domestic market were taxed for revenue purposes only.

The act of 1816 was the first tariff measure in which protection was the object, rather than the incident, and because of the intense feeling of nationalism then prevailing, it was supported by all sections of the country. John C. Calhoun and Henry Clay lent their support to the cause of protection by urging that economic independence from Europe was essential to real political independence.

In 1819 there occurred the first world-wide industrial depression, and the resulting distress in this country was made the occasion for an unsuccessful attempt to raise customs duties. The agitation for increased protection continued, however, and in his message of December 2, 1823, President Monroe called upon Congress to review the tariff "for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defense and independence of the country."

The resulting Tariff Act of 1824 has been pronounced by some writers as the first really protective measure enacted by Congress. Its passage became assured only by the union of the manufacturing Middle States and the agricultural West. The bill found its chief supporter in Henry Clay, who glorified the protective policy with the name "the American system." The debates again revealed the conflict of sectional interests, the bill being opposed by the planting interests of the South and the commercial interests of the East. Although the South had been almost solid for protection in 1816, it now denied that it was constitutional. New England was divided, wavering between manufactures and a return to its old shipping interests.

Under the tariff of 1824 the average rate rose to about 33 percent, and behind this wall of protection the capital invested in industries trebled in 3 years.

THE ACT OF 1828, OR TARIFF OF ABOMINATIONS

In 1828 the tariff was again increased, the general level of the rates being raised to 49 percent. This represented the extreme of protective legislation prior to the Civil War and stirred up increased resentment in the South. The act of 1828 had its origin in the agitation for increased protection following the defeat of the Mallary woolens bill in 1827, which culminated in the Harrisburg Convention.

One significant feature of the debate on the bill was the reversal on the part of Daniel Webster of his attitude toward the tariff. In 1824, representing as he did the commercial city of Boston, he strongly espoused free trade. Now he frankly changed sides, giving as his reason the fact that Massachusetts had accepted protection as a settled national policy and had invested her capital in manufactures.

The act of 1828 was derisively termed the "black tariff" and the "tariff of abominations" and gave increased impetus to the nullification movement, which was then gaining a foothold in the South.

NULLIFICATION

When Andrew Jackson assumed the Presidency in 1829, the threat of nullification was one of his most pressing problems. The interests of the South were the reverse of those of the North. Prevented by its slave labor from the development of manufactures, it sought the unrestricted importation of foreign goods and a wide foreign market for its agricultural products, particularly its cotton.

During 1828 and 1829 every legislature from Virginia to Mississippi declared for secession or nullification if the tariff policy were not radically changed. John C. Calhoun reversed his stand on the tariff to support his section and advocated nullification as the milder of the two remedies for the South's problem. In his famous Exposition he contended that the tariff was ruinous to the South; that protection was unconstitutional; and that in the case of an act so injurious and unconstitutional, any State had a right peacefully to nullify the law within her borders until Congress should appeal to the States and be sustained by three-fourths of them.

In 1830 the question precipitated the great Webster-Hayne debate, and a few weeks thereafter President Jackson indicated he would meet nullification with force when at a Jefferson Day dinner in Washington he uttered his famous toast, "The Federal Union: It must be preserved."

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1832

With a view to appeasing the South, President Jackson later recommended a downward revision of the tariff. Defying Jackson, and in spite of an excess of revenues in the Treasury, Henry Clay continued to champion the so-called "American system." The resulting Tariff Act of 1832 was perhaps a victory for both, as it removed some of the objections to the act of 1828 and restored the tariff to about the level of the act of 1824.

THE COMPROMISE TARIFF OF 1833

The reductions made by the Tariff Act of 1832 did not satisfy the South, and the opposition to protection continued to be violent. During the campaign for Jackson's reelection in 1832, South Carolina adopted an ordinance declaring the tariff laws void within that State and threatening war if the Federal Government attempted to enforce them.

Although President Jackson reaffirmed his determination to uphold the law, by the bayonet if necessary, he again recommended a downward revision of the tariff. Clay, feeling that the whole protective system was endangered, joined hands with Calhoun to draw a tariff bill acceptable to South Carolina. Their measure, known as the "Compromise Tariff of 1833", enlarged the free list and provided for a gradual reduction of duties so that by 1842 no rate should exceed 20 percent.

Congress passed the Compromise Tariff, and with it a Force bill, giving the President forces with which to bring South Carolina to obedience. President Jackson obtained what satisfaction he could by signing the Force bill ahead of the tariff measure, and 10 days later South Carolina repealed its nullification ordinance.

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1842

After the Compromise Tariff had been in effect for 4 years and the gradual reductions in rates began to be felt, a panic occurred which was the greatest the country had known up to that time. While the advocates of free trade ascribed it to currency inflation and speculation, the friends of protection believed that the Compromise Tariff was in part, if not wholly, responsible. In the election of 1840, the Whigs, who had espoused protection, were swept into office, and 2 years later, under the act of 1842, tariff duties were restored to about the level which had existed prior to Clay's Compromise measure.

THE WALKER TARIFF OF 1846

Following the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1842, the Nation again experienced a period of prosperity, and there was an excess of revenues in the Treasury. In the Presidential campaign of 1844, Henry Clay was the candidate of the Whig Party and James K. Polk bore the Democratic standard. Clay continued to support the policy of protection, but his connection with the Compromise Tariff of 1833 lost him many friends, who thought that he had conceded too much. Polk, on the other hand, was represented as a free trader in the South and as a protectionist in the North. The question of slavery was then a big issue, and the Abolitionist Party, under Birney, drew enough votes from Clay in New York to give that State and the election to Polk.

Democratic success at the polls, along with the surplus in the Treasury, presented a favorable opportunity for a downward revision of the tariff. The Secretary of the Treasury, Robert J. Walker, laid before Congress a proposed bill which embraced the following principles, among others: No more money was to be collected from customs than is necessary for the support of the Government; no duty was to be imposed above the lowest rate which will yield the greatest revenue; the maximum duty was to be imposed on luxuries; and all specific duties were to be abolished.

Congress in 1846 adopted the Walker plan with some modifications, including an increase in the suggested ad valorem duties, in order to provide revenue with which to carry on the war with Mexico. The act of 1846 remained in effect for 11 years, and during the last 8 years of its operation the average rate on dutiable imports was 26 percent.

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1857

Between 1846 and 1860 the people laid aside the consideration of economic and business questions to give their undivided attention to the slavery issue, which was then threatening to dissolve the Union. Thus, with little opposition, the tariff was again lowered in 1857 to offset a redundant revenue. The act of 1857, which remained in effect for 4 years, reduced the average rate on dutiable imports to approximately 20 percent. This was the lowest average under any act from 1812 to the present time.

THE MORRILL TARIFF OF MARCH 2, 1861

The reduction of rates under the act of 1857 was made when the country was at the height of a wave of prosperity and speculation, which culminated in the financial crisis of that year. To offset the consequent decline in customs receipts, the Morrill bill was passed by the House of Representatives in March 1860, restoring the rates of the Walker Tariff of 1846. The bill was held up in the Senate for approximately a year, and as finally enacted contained many higher rates and was avowedly protective. It was signed by President Buchanan just two days before he relinquished his office to Abraham Lincoln.

CIVIL WAR TARIFFS

When the Republican Party, under President Lincoln, assumed control of the Government in 1861, it found the Nation's credit impaired and the Treasury bankrupt. Moreover, the Southern States had begun to secede from the Union immediately after the election, and on February 4, 1861, Jefferson Davis had been named President of the Confederacy. It is significant that the Constitution which the seceding States adopted gave the Confederate Congress the power to levy duties and imposts for revenue purposes only, it being specifically provided therein that no duties should be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

The Republican Party in nominating Lincoln had made protection one of its cardinal principles. Accordingly when it came to framing the Civil War tariffs, Congress had protection as well as increased revenue in mind. The first of the war tariffs was the act of August 5, 1861, which imposed new and increased duties upon a large number of items, in addition to levying certain internal taxes. In December of the same year the duties on coffee, tea, and sugar were increased. The most important of the other war tariffs were the act of July 14, 1862, increasing tariff rates generally; the resolution of April 29, 1862, increasing duties by 50 percent for a period of 60 days; and the act of June 30, 1864, making additional general increases.

These tariff increases were all made in conjunction with the imposition of comprehensive and burdensome excise taxes upon many kinds of manufactures and occupations, as well as a tax upon incomes. Under the various Civil War acts customs receipts rose from $39,000,000 in 1861 to $179,000,000 in 1866. Receipts from internal-revenue taxes, which had not been imposed prior to the war, rose to $309,000,000 in 1866.

The effect of the war tariffs upon the average rate on dutiable imports was to raise it from 19 percent in 1861, the last year under the act of 1857, to 47 percent in 1865.

POST CIVIL WAR TARIFF LEGISLATION

With the close of the war it became the policy of Congress to reduce the volume of direct taxation and, so far as possible, limit governmental expenditures to the receipts from customs and the excise taxes on tobacco and spirits.

On July 14, 1870, President Grant approved the general tariff act of that date, which reduced the duties on many articles and gave additional protection to others. Such reductions as were made applied almost exclusively to articles of a distinctly "revenue" character, such as tea, coffee, sugar, spices, and so on.

In 1872 the country was again in the midst of a wave of prosperity and speculation. Imports and customs receipts reached new heights; and, despite the enormous reductions in internal taxes, the Government's receipts continued to be excessive. Largely to offset this condition the act of May 1, 1872, was passed, transferring the most important revenue items, coffee and tea, to the free list. Later, under the act of May 1, 1872, Congress made a flat reduction of 10 percent in the duties on a number of the protective items and effected numerous specific changes in addition to adding a large number of articles to the free list. Following the panic of 1873, the Government's revenues fell off sharply, and these reductions were abrogated.

The depression in business following the panic of 1873 nearly cost the Republicans the Presidency in 1876, and did cost them control of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth and two succeeding Congresses, beginning December 6, 1875. During this period the Democrats made numerous unsuccessful assaults upon the tariff, including proposals not only to reduce rates but to impose duties "purely and solely" for revenue. Only one of the Democratic proposals was enacted—a measure putting salts of quinine and sulphate of quinine on the free list.

The election of James A. Garfield, in 1880, continued the successive line of Republican Presidents following the Civil War, and insured a continuation of the protective tariff. It was during the campaign of 1880 that Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock, the Democratic candidate, remarked that the tariff was a "local affair." This now-famous statement was greatly ridiculed by the Republicans, who upheld protection as a national system, and may have had much to do with his defeat. The words "local affair" have been changed by popular use to "local issue."

The surplus in the Treasury was at that time so great that the necessity for some revision of the tariff was universally conceded. The Democrats demanded a return to a tariff for revenue, or free trade, while the Republicans insisted upon the preservation of the principles of protection. In 1882, in response to the suggestion of President Arthur, who had succeeded to that office following the assassination of President Garfield, Congress authorized the appointment of a commission of nine to study the question and make recommendations.

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1883

The commission appointed to investigate the tariff made its report in December 1882, as a result of which the House Ways and Means Committee formulated a bill reducing duties by about 20 percent. The commission's schedules were followed in the main, and most of the deviations were in the direction of further reductions rather than increases. However, before the House could pass the bill, the Senate passed the internal revenue bill which had previously been sent over from the House, adding amendments which virtually revised the entire tariff. The House then laid aside its own bill, disagreed to the Senate amendments to the internal revenue bill, and sent the latter measure to conference, where the final draft was shaped.

As approved by President Arthur on March 3, 1883, the measure was quite different from that recommended by the commission, some of the duties being higher and others lower. In general, it was thoroughly protective and remained in effect for the next 7 years, during which time no important revisions occurred. Under the 1883 law, the average rate on dutiable imports was 45 percent.

DEMOCRATIC TARIFF PROPOSALS, 1884–90

In 1884, Representative Morrison, of Illinois, the then Democratic Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill proposing a general tariff reduction of 20 percent and the entire remission of the duties on iron ore, coal, lumber, and other articles. This measure failed to pass the House of Representatives in spite of a Democratic majority of nearly 80. It was in connection with the debate on this measure that William McKinley raised himself to leadership of the protectionist forces in this country.

In the Presidential campaign of 1884 the Republican candidate, James G. Blaine, was opposed by Grover Cleveland. Notwithstanding large reductions in the internal-revenue taxes, there was still a large surplus in the Treasury, and both parties seemed to concede the need for a further reduction in the tariff.

Owing to factional differences in the Republican Party, Mr. Blaine failed to carry New York, thus throwing that State and the election to Mr. Cleveland. In his message to Congress in December 1885, President Cleveland called upon his party to take up the tariff, but the Democratic House of Representatives refused to consider a bill proposed by Mr. Morrison. Two years later President Cleveland sent his famous free-trade message to Congress, in which he referred to the tariff as "vicious" and "inequitable."

In response to this message the House passed the Mills bill, so named after the then Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Roger Q. Mills, of Texas. This measure proposed to transfer nearly all raw materials to the free list, together with most of partially manufactured articles, and in addition made sweeping reductions in the protective duties. In the Senate, where the Republicans still had a majority, a substitute measure was prepared which was in harmony with the principles of protection. With Congress thus divided, no final legislation was enacted, but the position of both major parties was sharply defined, and in the campaign of 1888, between President Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison, the tariff question was squarely presented to the American people.

THE M'KINLEY TARIFF OF 1890

The Republicans naturally interpreted the election of Mr. Harrison as a mandate for the continuation of the policy of protection. Accordingly, in 1890, Congress enacted the McKinley tariff, which takes its name from the then Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, William McKinley, of Ohio, who later became President. The purpose of the bill, as explained in the report of the committee, was to impose duties upon such foreign products as compete with our own, and to enlarge the free list wherever it could be done without injury to any American industry.

While the McKinley Act raised the general level of the protective duties, it at the same time extended the free list to such an extent that one-half the importations, on a value basis, came in free of duty. This was the highest ratio of free imports in the history of the country up to that time. In the fiscal years 1892–94, the average rate on dutiable imports proved to be over 49 percent, but on free and dutiable goods combined it was only 22 percent.

One feature of the act of 1890 was the provision for penalty duties on certain items. Coffee, tea, hides, sugar, and molasses were placed on the free list; but it was provided that if any country producing and exporting such articles to the United States imposed unequal or unreasonable duties on our products, the President should suspend the free entry of these articles from that country and impose thereon certain rates of duty provided in the act.

It had been found that 87 percent of the imports from Central and South American countries were free of duty, while nearly every class of articles which we exported to them was subject to high duties. This penalty provision forced these countries to admit our products on favorable terms. Unlike most reciprocal arrangements, it did not involve any concessions in duty on our part which might result in injury to domestic industries.

THE WILSON-GORMAN TARIFF OF 1894

The Democrats were returned to power under Grover Cleveland in the election of 1892, and although a financial panic occurred in September 1893, the administration felt compelled to go through with its promise to reduce the tariff. Accordingly, the Wilson bill was reported to the House by the Ways and Means Committee and was passed substantially unchanged. In the Senate, however, where some of the Democratic Members were more or less half-hearted on the question of tariff reduction, many changes were made in the direction of modifying the reductions proposed in the House bill. The bill was then sent to conference, where, despite a letter from President Cleveland urging resistance to the Senate amendments, the House conferees capitulated. Mr. Cleveland signified his displeasure by letting the Wilson-Gorman Act become a law without his signature.

The changes made by the act of 1894 were not very great but tended in the direction of lower rates. To offset the anticipated reduction in revenue a duty was again placed on sugar and an income tax was imposed, which was later declared unconstitutional. The Wilson-Gorman Act remained in effect for 3 years, during which time the average rate of dutiable imports was 41 percent.

THE DINGLEY TARIFF OF 1897

The Presidential election of 1896 was won by the Republicans on the issue of sound currency. The successful candidate was William McKinley, who had been defeated for reelection to the House following the enactment of the tariff bill of 1890, which bears his name, but who the next year was elected Governor of Ohio. In spite of the predominance of the currency question President McKinley gave immediate consideration to the tariff by calling a special session to revise the Wilson-Gorman law.

During the closing days of the Cleveland administration the Republican Ways and Means Committee, under the leadership of its chairman, Nelson Dingley, Jr., of Maine, had been preparing a bill to be introduced at the opening of the new Congress. The resulting Tariff Act of 1897 was in general a redraft of the McKinley Act, although in many instances the rates were lower, and in a few cases the rates of the Wilson bill were allowed to stand. Its twofold purpose, as expressed by Mr. Dingley, was to "raise additional revenue and to encourage the industries of the United States."

In addition to restoring protection, the Dingley Act revived the penalty duties provided in the McKinley Act and also set forth a list of concessions which the President might make in the duties on certain articles (argols, spirits, wines, paintings, drawings, and statuary) in return for equivalent concessions by foreign countries. The act also authorized the President to negotiate reciprocity treaties granting reductions up to 20 percent, but required that any such treaty, before becoming effective, must be ratified by both the House and Senate.

The Dingley law remained in effect for 12 years, or until 1909, and during that time the average rate on dutiable imports was 46 percent. In this period, domestic manufactures increased tremendously, and our exports found their way into the markets of the world. That the people were entirely satisfied with the return to protection was attested by the successive Republican victories at the polls in the years following the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1897. In addition to electing Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft, the Republicans controlled the House of Representatives from 1895 to 1911, and the Senate from 1895 to 1913, a remarkable record.

RECIPROCITY WITH CUBA

After the War with Spain, President Theodore Roosevelt negotiated a reciprocity treaty with the new Republic of Cuba, to which the Senate advised and consented. Pursuant thereto, Congress passed the act of December 17, 1903, which provides that as long as the treaty shall remain in force all Cuban products which on that date were imported into the United States free of duty shall continue to be so admitted, and that all other articles shall be granted a reduction of 20 percent in the duties then or thereafter imposed. Cuba, in turn, grants similar concessions to the United States. The treaty is still in force.

THE PAYNE-ALDRICH TARIFF OF 1909

After the Tariff Act of 1897 had been in effect for about a decade there was a general feeling that its rates were ill-adjusted to the existing industrial conditions. Moreover, there was a growing animosity toward trusts, which were thought by some to be fostered by the tariff.

In response to public sentiment, the Republican platform of 1908 declared for a thorough-going revision of the Dingley Act, and asserted that the "true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries." The Democratic platform, on the other hand, called for an immediate reduction of the duties on necessaries, and for placing on the free list all articles entering into competition with the so-called "trust controlled" products.

Immediately after Mr. Taft's election, the Ways and Means Committee, under the direction of its chairman, Sereno E. Payne, of New York, began the preparation of a new bill which was introduced at the special session of Congress in March 1909. The bill passed the House substantially as prepared by the committee, but in the Senate a large number of amendments were made, the tendency of which was to increase the rates in the House bill and wipe out many of the reductions which had been made therein. When the bill reached the conference stage, President Taft brought pressure to bear in favor of the lower House rates, and in the end a measure resulted which was acceptable to him.

It has been estimated that the act of 1909 reduced rates in 584 instances, affecting 20 percent of the imports, while making 300 increases. During the 4 years which it was in operation, the average rate on dutiable imports was approximately 41 percent.

The Payne act abandoned the principle of reciprocity, which had proved very unsatisfactory, and adopted instead a maximum and minimum schedule of rates. The maximum schedule was made generally applicable, but the President was empowered to put the minimum schedule into effect with respect to imports from any country which he found did not discriminate against our own products. To assist the President in making his findings, authority was given for the establishment of a tariff board, and as a result of its investigation the minimum schedule of rates was proclaimed with respect to imports from all countries.

THE UNDERWOOD-SIMMONS TARIFF OF 1913

In the Presidential election of 1912 Woodrow Wilson was swept into office by an unprecedented electoral vote on account of the split between President Taft and Theodore Roosevelt. While the Republican platform of that year reaffirmed the party's belief in protection, the Democrats declared for a tariff for revenue only, asserting that "protection" was unconstitutional. Owing to the peculiar circumstances of the campaign, it could hardly be said that the Democrats received a mandate from the people in favor of a revenue tariff. Nevertheless, they were quick to seize the opportunity presented by Mr. Wilson's election to revise the Payne-Aldrich Law.

Upon assuming office President Wilson called an extra session of Congress to meet April 7, 1913, and on the opening day Mr. Underwood, of Alabama, then Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced a tariff bill which had been prepared by the Democratic majority in the short session of the Sixty-second Congress. This bill became the basis for a second bill which was introduced and reported 2 weeks later.

The bill passed the House approximately 2 weeks after its introduction, the Democrats having bound their Members to support the bill and resist all Republican attempts at amendment. In the Senate progress was much slower, but after being debated in that body all summer the bill was passed on September 9. The Senate made many amendments to the House bill, but the differences were easily ironed out in conference, owing to the active influence of President Wilson.

In addition to reducing rates generally the Underwood-Simmons Act made considerable additions to the free list, including such items as iron ore, pig iron, agricultural implements, coal, lumber, numerous agricultural products (such as wool, cattle, meat, eggs, milk, cream, wheat, corn, flour, and hemp), and numerous manufactures (including boots and shoes, gunpowder, wood pulp, and print paper). Sugar also was made free of duty under a process of gradual reductions, but this provision later was modified because of the large loss of revenue which resulted.

One feature of the act of 1913 was the introduction of the so-called "competitive" principle, as distinguished from the Republican doctrine of equalizing foreign and domestic production costs. Although the Democratic platform had declared simply for a tariff for revenue, Chairman Underwood gave a new interpretation of this phrase when he declared that it meant a competitive tariff, or one which allows sufficient imports of every product made into the United States to bring about active competition in all industries. President Wilson expressed a similar view in his message to Congress.

The act of 1913 had been in effect but 10 months when in August 1914 the World War broke out in Europe. During the war period commerce was so disturbed that the rates of the Underwood law had little effect one way or the other. Virtually all European competition was cut off, and in spite of lowered duties domestic producers enjoyed a high degree of artificial protection. After the war, however, there came a deluge of foreign importations. In 1920, the last full year under the Underwood Act, the average ad valorem rate on dutiable imports was only 16.4 percent, the lowest in any one year since before the Civil War.

Any reference to the Tariff Act of 1913 would be incomplete without mentioning that it was this law which gave the country its first income tax subsequent to the ratification of the sixteenth, or income-tax, amendment. During the Civil War a temporary income tax had been imposed, the constitutionality of which was never challenged; but when a simliar levy was enacted in 1894, the Supreme Court held it to be a direct tax, which, under the Constitution, must be apportioned among the States according to population. The sixteenth amendment, which became effective February 28, 1913, obviated this requirement with respect to the income tax. It provides as follows:

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration."

From 1789 until the Civil War customs receipts furnished practically the entire revenue of the Government. At that time, in order to meet the costs of the war, certain internal-revenue taxes were imposed in conjunction with increased tariff duties, to which reference already has been made. From 1864 through 1868 these internal taxes produced more revenue than the tariff. Most of these war levies were later repealed, but, as has been previously pointed out, the excise taxes on tobacco and spirits continued to be a major source of revenue.

The year before the income-tax law of 1913 was enacted, 45 percent of the Government's ordinary receipts came from customs duties, 42 percent from miscellaneous excise taxes, and 4 percent from the excise tax on corporations. The balance of the total receipts of $693,000,000 was accounted for by sales of public lands and other miscellaneous revenues.

The income tax as imposed under the act of 1913 was not a large revenue producer, due to the low rates and large exemptions. However, beginning with the World War years, from 1916 on, when the demand for revenue was so great, it became the backbone of the Federal revenue system, producing nearly $4,000,000,000 in the fiscal year 1920 as compared with $322,000,000 from customs.

Although in the fairly normal year of 1926 customs receipts were nearly $580,000,000, this sum represented less than 15 percent of the Government's ordinary receipts, the income tax accounting for 50 percent and miscellaneous excise taxes nearly 22 percent. The fact is that Government expenditures have grown so great that customs receipts no longer can be counted upon for a major portion of its revenues. In 1912, when customs receipts produced 45 percent of the ordinary receipts, the cost of government was less than $700,000,000. Now, of course, it runs up into the billions.

EMERGENCY TARIFF OF 1921

I have already stated that the World War provided a period of artificial protection to domestic producers, in spite of the low rates of the Underwood tariff and the placing of many agricultural and other products on the free list. After the war, when the normal channels of trade were reopened, this country became the dumping ground for surplus European war stocks. At the same time, deflation and the collapse of the price structure delivered a staggering blow to industry and agriculture, especially the latter.

With a view to relieving agricultural distress as much as possible, the Republican Congress in the winter of 1920–21 passed an emergency tariff bill placing temporary duties on a number of the principal farm products. This measure was vetoed by President Wilson the day before Mr. Harding became President. However, in a special session of Congress called by the latter the measure was again passed, becoming a law on May 27, 1921. Originally it was to have operated for only 6 months, but it was later extended indefinitely, or until permanent general legislation could be enacted.

In addition to imposing temporary duties on agricultural products, the emergency tariff provided for an embargo on dyestuffs and levied a special antidumping duty on all foreign merchandise sold to domestic importers at less than the fair market value. This latter duty, by the way, is still in effect.

THE FORDNEY-M'CUMBER TARIFF OF 1922

The conditions which gave rise to the enactment of the emergency tariff also necessitated a permanent general tariff revision. In fact, work on a permanent measure was begun long before the emergency act became a law. As early as 1919 the Republican House of Representatives passed a resolution directing the Tariff Commission to prepare a summary of tariff information containing data in condensed form on each item in the law. In June 1919 hearings were held on the subject of dyestuffs and other new war-time industries. Following President Harding's election in 1920 the Ways and Means Committee announced public hearings beginning January 6, 1921, with a view to undertaking a general revision of the tariff. These hearings lasted until the middle of February, but it was not until July that a bill was reported to the House by Chairman Fordney.

The Fordney bill passed the House less than a month after its introduction, and the Senate Finance Committee at once began hearings on the measure. It was not reported to the Senate, however, until the following April, the Finance Committee having in the meantime laid aside the tariff to take up the internal-revenue bill which had been sent over from the House. The delay was occasioned by the fact that the tariff bill, as passed by the House, had provided for American valuation of imported merchandise, with the rates adjusted accordingly. The Finance Committee voted to restore the foreign valuation basis before considering the House bill further, thus necessitating a recomputation of all ad valorem rates.

The Fordney-McCumber bill was under consideration in the Senate until August, finally becoming a law on September 21, 1922, 1 year and 9 months after the House began hearings on the measure.

In enacting the Fordney measure it was the aim of the Republican Congress to substitute protection for the "tariff for revenue" policy of the Underwood law, and in the main the 1922 act constituted a return to the general level of rates which had existed before the Democrats came into power in 1913, with the necessary adjustments for changed competitive conditions. The bill showed the influence of a number of new industries which had grown up during the war and whose existence was threatened by the return to normal times. One of these was the production of dyestuffs, which formerly had been supplied by Germany.

It was interesting to note in connection with the debate on the Fordney bill, both in the House and Senate, that the Republican theory of protection was seldom attacked by the Democrats, most of the criticism being directed to the degree of protection provided. For over a hundred years, protection had been anathema to the South, but with its recent industrial development there has come a change of viewpoint. Not only did the cane producers of Louisiana continue to demand protection, but they were joined by various other groups, including the textile manufacturers of the Carolinas, the graphite producers of Alabama, and so on.

During the nearly 8 years during which it was in operation the average rate on dutiable imports under the Fordney law was 38.5 percent, as compared with 27 percent under the Underwood Act and 40.7 percent under the Payne Act of 1909. The average rate on both free and dutiable imports under the Fordney Act was 14 percent.

The most notable feature of the act of 1922 was the introduction of the flexible tariff. It was evident when the bill was under consideration that because of rapidly changing conditions and the necessary readjustments following the war, the task of writing a more or less permanent rate on a given article was exceedingly difficult. Within a few months it might be entirely too low or too high. It was to cope with this prospective situation that the House originally based the duties in the Fordney bill upon the American value of imported articles.

When the Senate rejected American valuation, it substituted the flexible tariff, by which the President was given the power to modify the duties fixed in the act within a range of 50 percent, either up or down, when he found after investigation by the Tariff Commission that an existing duty did not equalize the difference in cost of production of a domestic article and like or similar foreign articles. The President also was given the power to base duties on the American value where he found that the differences in production costs could not be equalized by changing the rate itself.

The purpose of Congress in enacting the flexible-tariff provision was to provide a means whereby duties might be maintained at the proper level to offset foreign cost-of-production advantages without the necessity of constant congressional action.

The constitutionality of the flexible tariff was immediately challenged on the ground that Congress had thereby delegated legislative powers to the President. However, in a test case the Supreme Court overruled this contention, holding in effect that Congress had merely laid down a rule or "yardstick" for rate making and directed the President to modify rates to conform thereto. Such a delegation of authority, the Court held, was administrative only and therefore did not constitute an unconstitutional delegation of legislative powers. (See Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U. S. 406.)

THE HAWLEY-SMOOT TARIFF OF 1930

The Tariff Act of 1922 was passed while the unsettled conditions following the World War still prevailed, both at home and abroad. Subsequent to that time many new products entered the markets, new conditions of production arose, and new and active competitors entered the field.

In the Presidential campaign of 1928 the Republican Party promised the country a readjustment of the tariff "in the light of changes in the world competitive situation" subsequent to the enactment of the Fordney law. Construing the Republican victory at the polls as both a mandate and a direction to carry out this pledge, the Ways and Means Committee began hearings in the short session of the Seventieth Congress with a view to revising the act of 1922. These hearings lasted from January 7 to February 27, 1929, during which time more than 1,100 persons were heard and some 11,000 pages of testimony taken.

Following the hearings, the Republican members of the committee began the preparation of the bill, the Democratic members being excluded in accordance with the practice followed by both parties. Prior to the hearings, each of the 15 majority members had been assigned by the chairman to specialize on one of the 15 schedules of the 1922 law, and when the actual drafting of the bill began these members became chairmen of the subcommittees in charge of the respective schedules. The subcommittees were composed of three members, so each Republican served on two others in addition to the one of which he was chairman.

In the preparation of the first draft of the bill, the subcommittees were assisted by commodity experts from the Tariff Commission, who briefed the hearings and gave technical information regarding the thousands of items under consideration. The Tariff Commission also prepared a summary of tariff information giving statistics and other data regarding the articles in each paragraph of the law.

When all of the subcommittees had finished their work, they reported to the full Republican membership, and their recommendations were then approved, modified, or rejected. The bill was then put in final shape and was introduced in the House by Chairman Hawley on May 7, 1929, during the special session of Congress called by President Hoover to consider the tariff and farm relief. The following day the bill was formally referred back to the committee for report, and on May 9, by a strict party vote, it was reported to the House. After being fully debated in the House, it was passed on May 28, with sundry committee amendments.

The Senate Finance Committee immediately began hearings on the measure, and it was reported to the Senate September 4. From that time until March 24, 1930, it was before the Senate, finally passing that body on that date with 1,253 amendments. The bill was in conference during April and May, and it was not until the middle of June that it finally passed. The new law was approved by President Hoover on June 17, 1930, 18 months after its preparation began.

An analysis of the Hawley-Smoot Act made by the Tariff Commission showed that of the 3,296 items specifically mentioned as dutiable in either the 1922 or 1930 acts, the rates on 1,112, or 34 percent, were changed. Of these changes, 890 were increases, including 50 transfers from the free list to the dutiable list, and 235 were decreases, including 75 transfers to the free list. The more significant rate increases pertained primarily to the agricultural schedule. The flexible-tariff provision, which was first incorporated in the act of 1922, was continued in the Hawley-Smoot Act with some modifications.

From the time of its enactment in June 1930, until the end of the calendar year 1933, the average rate on dutiable imports under the Hawley Act was 52.8 percent. However, on free and dutiable goods combined the average was only 17.7 percent. This great difference is accounted for by the fact that approximately two-thirds of the imports, on the basis of value, are entered duty free.

DEMOCRATIC TARIFF PROPOSALS IN THE SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS

When the Democrats assumed control of the House of Representatives in the Seventy-second Congress, beginning in December 1931, one of their first major legislative proposals was a bill amending the flexible-tariff provision of the 1930 law and providing for the negotiation of reciprocal-tariff agreements.

Under the bill, the President would have been shorn of his power to modify tariff rates, and any proposed changes recommended by the Tariff Commission would have required congressional action to put them into effect. While the bill authorized and requested the President to negotiate trade agreements with foreign countries, it also provided that such agreements should not become operative "until Congress by law shall have approved them."

The measure was passed in the House by a party vote, and its passage in the Senate was made possible by a coalition of Democrats and Progressives. President Hoover vetoed the bill, and the House failed to pass it over the veto. Mr. Hoover contended that the measure destroyed the principle of the flexible tariff and said that the provision for foreign-trade agreements was an abandonment of the policy of uniform and equal treatment for all nations.

IMPORT TAXES UNDER THE REVENUE ACT OF 1932

During the consideration of the internal-revenue bill of 1932 there was considerable agitation for a tariff on petroleum, coming principally from the independent producers of Texas and Oklahoma.

Piecemeal tariff revision has seldom been undertaken in recent years, but the necessity for amending the tariff act was obviated by the simple expedient of including in the internal-revenue bill an item placing an excise tax upon imported crude petroleum and related products. This was a signal for other groups desiring tariffs to put forth their demands, and when the Revenue Act of 1932 was finally passed it contained three other tariff items in the guise of an excise tax. In addition to crude petroleum, coal, lumber, and copper were subjected to a tax upon their importation.

When the Revenue Act of 1934 was under consideration, certain animal and vegetable oils were added to the list.

RECIPROCAL TARIFF ACT OF 1934

The Democratic platform of 1932 advocated a competitive tariff for revenue, presumably along the lines of the Underwood law, coupled with reciprocity. Although they are now in complete control of the legislative and executive branches of the Government, the Democrats have avoided a general downward revision of the tariff. However, virtually the same end can be achieved under the Reciprocal Tariff Act, which was passed in the Seventy-third Congress as an administration measure.

This act gives the President virtually carte blanche authority to enter into binding reciprocal-tariff agreements with foreign countries, and to make concessions in duties pursuant to such agreements, without the necessity of congressional approval of his action. In the latter respect, it differs from all past reciprocity measures, including the Democratic proposal in the Seventy-second Congress.

It is the theory of those sponsoring the measure, including the present Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, that we should not produce in this country any article which can be more efficiently or more economically produced elsewhere. They believe that certain of our domestic industries should be sacrificed as a means of gaining larger foreign markets for other industries which are on an export basis.

When this measure was before Congress, it led to a partisan debate, with the Republicans in bitter opposition. They contended, among other things, that it constituted an unprecedented and unconstitutional delegation of the taxing and treaty-making powers of Congress; that it put into the hands of one man the power of life and death over every domestic industry dependent upon tariff protection; that it was inconsistent with the recovery program, since by inviting a flood of foreign importations it would result in increased unemployment; and that owing to the present tendency of nations to make themselves self-sustained and self-contained, any hope of recovering the old foreign markets was illusory.

In view of their opposition to the enactment of the flexible-tariff provisions, it was surprising that the Democrats would have sponsored a measure which went far beyond that law in granting to the President power over the tariff. They even cited the flexible tariff as a precedent for the reciprocal-tariff measure, but the Republicans answered that there was no comparison in the two propositions, since under the former a rate-making formula was laid down by Congress to which the President was required to conform, whereas under the reciprocal tariff he could fix rates upon any basis he chose.

The Democrats also cited as a precedent the President's powers under the McKinley tariff of 1890, but again the Republicans answered that no analogy could be drawn, because under that act Congress merely gave the President the authority to put prescribed rates into effect on certain named articles when he found a given state of facts to exist. In other words, they said, he had no rate-making powers.

When the Democrats attempted to show that the Republican Party in the past had been committed to a policy of reciprocity, the Republicans answered that it was an entirely different kind of reciprocity which they had advocated, involving neither a surrender of the taxing power to the President nor the destruction of any domestic industries. If an attempt was to be made to expand foreign trade by reciprocal-tariff agreements, they contended, it should be done along the lines of the McKinley law, using the great domestic market for noncompetitive items now on the free list, which constitute two-thirds of our imports, as a lever to force favorable concessions for our exports in foreign markets. Such a measure, they said, would not injure a single domestic industry and would cost the country nothing in actual concessions.

Aside from their opposition to the reciprocal tariff measure on economic and constitutional grounds, the Republicans bitterly criticized the methods which the Democrats used to enact it. Whereas the Fordney-McCumber law was 21 months in the course of preparation and the Hawley-Smoot Act 18 months, this measure was before Congress only a little more than 3 months. The hearings on the measure were called only a few days after its introduction, before the industries affected had time to digest the bill or prepare their cases, and it was rushed through the House without anyone understanding what it was all about or what its ultimate effect on the country would be.

CONCLUSION

It is evident from this brief review that the tariff has played an important part in the economic development of the United States, and that it is perhaps the oldest political issue in our history.

For nearly a century and a half the Nation has grown and prospered under the protective tariff. In the early days it made possible the establishment of home industries which today make this country economically independent of most of the world. It has resulted in the establishment within our borders of the greatest home market on earth, in which is consumed 90 percent of the domestic production of movable goods and where one-half the business of the world is transacted. In addition it has enabled the building up of the American standard of living through the payment of higher wages than are enjoyed in any other country.

As a political issue, the tariff has had an interesting history. Universally accepted as a source of revenue, the propriety of its use as a means of encouraging home industries has frequently been challenged, even though upheld by the courts. The tariff once divided the North and the South and was one of the contributing causes of the Civil War.

The Republican Party, since its birth just prior to that war, has consistently upheld the protective tariff as one of its cardinal principles. Moreover, the Democratic Party, which for so long has advocated the use of the tariff "for revenue only", has gradually come to accept protection in principle, although differing as to the degree to which it should be applied. Thus, as the great Daniel Webster said a century ago, "protection" seems to be the settled national policy of this country.

Matters of public interest come and go, but it is perfectly apparent that from the beginning of our history no other subject has continued to hold such a predominant place in legislation as the tariff.

HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a copy of the bill that I am introducing today in reference to the H. O. L. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, the deplorable plight of thousands of home owners may be traced directly to this tremendous centralization of wealth in the hands of the few. These pirates who feast and fatten on the bleaching bones of a suffering humanity not only squeeze from them their small incomes and earnings in normal times, their all, but in periods of great economic distress they mortgage the future earnings and incomes of these unfortunates by foreclosing their homes and farms and then obtaining deficiency judgments for the disparity between the confiscation price of today and the normal price of good times.

This nefarious practice of these human vultures commonly known as "money lenders" can and must be stopped.

We stopped it with respect to farm foreclosures and deficiency judgments when we enacted into law on the last day of the last session of the Seventy-third Congress the Farm Bankruptcy Act, commonly known as the "Frazier-Lemke bill."

In that act we gave the hard-pressed farmer a 5-year moratorium, a scale down of the mortgage to its present value, the abolition of deficiency judgments, and a livable rate of interest of 1 percent on the mortgage. This in the event that the majority of the creditors in number and amount agree to abide by the provisions of this act. In the event that a majority refuses to agree then we again throw the protecting arm of Congress about these worthy citizens by providing that the farmer can continue to reside on his farm for a period of 5 years by the payment of a reasonable rental annually to the mortgagee or Shylock.

This is exactly what we propose to do for the distressed home owner under the provisions of the bill which I have introduced today and which herewith appears in my remarks.

Everyone seems to agree that additional bonds should be authorized for the use of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. Nearly everyone concedes that when these additional bonds are authorized, instead of giving the bureaucrats of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation carte blanche in the disposal of said bonds and funds, certain restrictions and regulations should be incorporated. We all know that abuses have been and now are tolerated by these bureaucrats that have militated against the welfare of those home owners who are most distressed and who need emergency refinancing most. The bill I am introducing is designed to eliminate all abuses, favoritism, and discrimination, so that those who are most keenly in distress will receive the greatest assistance and at the earliest possible moment.

My desire is to help, first, those wageworkers who have formerly earned their bread by the sweat of their brows and who now through no fault of their own, face continued unemployment; and those salaried workers in the professions and those thousands in small business and industry and those other thousands classed as independent producers.

The maximum amount that can be loaned to one individual, namely, $14,000, is much higher than needed to relieve the wants of these classes of worthy citizens which I have just enumerated. A maximum amount of $7,500 to be loaned to these wageworkers who create all the wealth and pay all the taxes would be ample and sufficient to relieve them fully. Indeed, in the cases of thousands the equivalent of $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 would be fulsome; hence I have reduced the maximum amount to $7,500, believing that this amount will represent the needs of the great majority of distressed mortgagors, not only those whose applications have already been filed but those other untold numbers who must either be given the opportunity to now file an application for Government refinancing or be foreclosed by the greedy and unfeeling money lenders.

To make it certain that the individual making application for a Government loan from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is really in distress, your attention is called to section 4 (k) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, which further amended so as to read as follows:

Providing and stipulating that the applicant must be in an involuntary default in the payment of principal, interest, or taxes, and does not possess the ability to maintain nor liquidate his present mortgage.

In short, he must actually be threatened with foreclosure and loss and confiscation of his home. That is the test. That is the yardstick that will measure his distress, and not to be subject to the rules, regulations, and whims of unsympathetic bureaucrats.

Safeguards are also provided in this bill to preclude the possibility of the distressed home owner being foreclosed and sold out by the liquidator of defunct banks, such as was done in a ruthless manner by Ira J. Fulton, State superintendent of banks during the administration of Gov. George White.

A typical case of the tragic sufferings of American people dispossessed by money lenders and set out in the street by the edicts of the court is pathetically depicted by a constituent of mine, Mrs. Mary E. McNabb, of Columbus, Ohio, who has, under date of January 5, advised me that she made application to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and endeavored to secure a loan through them ever since the first day that it opened. She states that—

I heard the President speak over the air asking everyone to write to him if we could not get a loan. I wrote in to him about this loan. They told a certain newspaperman that they would do nothing for me because I took it over their heads, so you see I lost the loan in answer to the President's message over the air inviting me to write in.

We had 4 double and 2 single houses. I lived in one of the doubles and the loss of rent from the unemployed was the cause of getting behind in payments on this property. They foreclosed and sold the double where I lived. They refused to give me a loan on any of the other properties as it was not my home, so you see I lost it all. They have taken away my home and income as my husband is an invalid and unable to work, with six in the family. He has had rheumatism for the last 24 years, bedfast part of the time, on crutches part of the time, and a builder part time. He has had several attacks of rheumastim and has been bedfast as long as 1 year at a time with the most severe pain, but still he managed to keep his family together. A source of income has always been from rent, but we have lost it all now unless there is a chance to get a home loan on our home which has been sold.

Copy of my bill to issue an additional $1,250,000,000 in bonds to enable the Corporation to grant additional relief to distressed home owners follows. You will note that the amount requested under maximum loans of $7,500 will relieve thousands more than under the old provision of a maximum loan of $14,000.

A bill to authorize the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to issue an additional $1,250,000,000 of bonds to enable the Corporation to grant additional relief to distressed home owners

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act of 1933, section 4 (c), as amended (relating to the aggregate amount of bonds which the Home Owners' Loan Corporation may issue), is amended by striking out "The Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $3,000,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "The Corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount not to exceed $4,250,000,000."

Section (d) (2) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is further amended by striking out "The face value of the bonds so exchanged plus accrued interest thereon and the cash so advanced shall not exceed in any case $14,000, or 80 percent of the value of the real estate as determined by an appraisal made by the Corporation, whichever is the smaller" and inserting in lieu thereof "The face value of the bonds so exchanged plus accrued interest thereon and the cash so advanced shall not exceed in any case $7,500, or 80 percent of the value of the real estate as determined by an appraisal made by the Corporation, whichever is the smaller."

Section 4 (k) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is further amended so as to read as follows:

"(k) The Board is authorized to make such bylaws, rules, and regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as may be necessary for the proper conduct of the affairs of the Corporation: Provided, That no such bylaws, rules, and regulations made or adopted which shall be inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as amended, to prevent foreclosure and provide emergency relief from foreclosure and for the refinancing of home mortgages, and which will prohibit or prevent distressed home owners who are qualified and eligible under the terms of this act, as amended, from obtaining refinancing of said home-mortgage indebtedness. The Corporation is further authorized and directed to retire and cancel the bonds and stock of the Corporation as rapidly as the resources of the Corporation will permit. Upon the retirement of such stock, the reasonable value thereof as determined by the Board shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and the receipts issued therefor shall be canceled. The Board shall proceed to liquidate the Corporation when its purposes have been accomplished and shall pay any surplus or accumulated funds into the Treasury of the United States. The Corporation may declare and pay such dividends to the United States as may be earned and as in the judgment of the Board it is proper for the Corporation to pay."

Section 4 (1) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended, is further amended to read as follows:

"(1) No home mortgage or other obligation or lien shall be acquired by the Corporation under subsection (d), and no cash advance shall be made under subsection (f) unless the applicant was in involuntary default on June 13, 1933, in the payment of either principal or interest on his home real estate, or of taxes the nonpayment of which constitutes a default under the terms of the mortgage on his real estate, and is found by the Corporation, at the time his application is considered not to possess the ability to maintain nor liquidate his present mortgage indebtedness: Provided, That the foregoing limitation shall not apply in any case in which it is specifically shown to the satisfaction of the Corporation that a default after June 13, 1933, and prior to the date this subsection as amended takes effect was due to financial losses, economic distress, unemployment, or other conditions beyond the control of the applicant, in which the home mortgage or other indebtedness is held by any institution in the process of liquidation."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 3973; Rept. No. 7) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. DITTER reserved all points of order on the bill.

ADDITIONAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION, THE NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD, AND THE SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION, 1935

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution (H. J. Res. 88) making additional appropriations for the Federal Communications Commission, the National Mediation Board, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CELLER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state what the bill is about?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The bill is a supplemental appropriation bill to provide for the Federal Communications Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the National Mediation Board to give them funds so that they can operate for the balance of the fiscal year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the House joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, for the purposes hereinafter enumerated, namely:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

For all authorized expenditures of the Federal Communications Commission in performing the duties imposed by the Communications Act of 1934, approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat., 1064), the Ship Act, approved June 24, 1910, as amended (U. S. C., title 46, secs. 484–487), the International Radiotelegraphic Convention (45 Stat., pt. 2, 2760), and Executive Order No. 3513, dated July 9, 1921, as amended by Executive Order No. 6779, dated June 30, 1934, relating to applications for submarine cable licenses, including personal services, contract stenographic reporting services, rental of quarters, newspapers, periodicals, reference books, law books, special counsel fees, supplies and equipment, including purchase and exchange of instruments, which may be purchased without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $25, improvement and care of grounds and repairs to buildings, traveling expenses, including expenses of attendance at meetings which in the discretion of the Commission are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities, and other necessary expenses, $480,000.

NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD

For all printing and binding for the National Mediation Board, $1,750.

NATIONAL RAILROAD ADJUSTMENT BOARD

For authorized expenditures of the National Railroad Adjustment Board, in performing the duties imposed by law, including personal services, contract stenographic reporting services, supplies and equipment, law books and books of reference, periodicals, traveling expenses, and rent of quarters outside the District of Columbia, $150,000.

SECURITES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

For all authorized expenditures of the Securities and Exchange Commission in performing the duties imposed by law or in pursuance of law and for other personal services, including employment of experts when necessary; contract stenographic reporting services; supplies and equipment; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, directories, periodicals, newspaper and press clippings; travel expenses, including the expense of attendance, when specifically authorized by the Commission, at meetings concerned with the work of the Securities and Exchange Commission; garage rental; foreign postage; mileage and witness fees; rent of building and equipment at the seat of government and elsewhere; and other necessary expenses, $825,000.

For all printing and binding for the Securities and Exchange Commission, $21,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, a short explanation of this bill should be sufficient. The activities provided for in this bill were created during the last session of this Congress. The Congress never appropriated and never intended to appropriate sufficient money to carry them through this fiscal year. The money they did provide was sufficient to carry them until this Congress met, in order that we might go into their needs and necessities and make a proper appropriation for the balance of the fiscal year. So, in fact, it is not a deficiency, but a supplemental appropriation, and intended to be so by the Congress.

Now, as to the items, the Budget sent us an estimate of $480,000 for the Federal Communications Commission. It had for this year only the appropriation made for the old Federal Radio Commission. The act of Congress last year greatly expanded its activities, and prescribed greater duties for it, such as regulation in telephone, telegraph, and cables, and the authority to fix the rates on those utilities, and evaluation of their property; also to prevent discrimination and to prevent refunds. So it was evident that the old appropriation for the Radio Commission alone was not sufficient. Therefore the Budget estimated $480,000, and the committee after investigation allowed that amount.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman care to yield for a question right there?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the gentleman's statement, nothing has been given to this new commission except what had been appropriated for the old Radio Commission?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Correct. In other words, the appropriation for the old Radio Commission had passed the House when we passed this bill creating the Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. SNELL. And with the additional duties, it needs the additional money?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I notice in the last two sentences, on page 2, line 17, this language is used:

Which, in the discretion of the Commission, are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities, and other necessary expenses, $480,000.

I should like to ask the gentleman whether it has been customary heretofore to allow sums of this size to be distributed in the discretion of the Commission?

Mr. BUCHANAN. These new activities added to it are something that no department of government has had any experience with to amount to anything. The Commission would be compelled to hold hearings in various parts of the country, as to rates, as to the question of discrimination in telephone and telegraph corporations, and so forth, and the Commission is charged with the duty to fix rates. Therefore, this traveling expense is necessary if they are to function properly and perform what we desire them to do. There is nothing new or unusual about that language.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. I have no objection to the passage of this resolution, but one or two provisions in it prompt me to predicate an inquiry thereon. There are provisions in this measure for printing and binding for these various agencies. Of course, that is all right, but it seems to me that attention should be called to the fact that there is a great deal of printing being done, perhaps not all by the Government Printing Office, but some of it through mimeograph machines and otherwise, and a great deal of expense being entailed from the standpoint of the Government, in sending out promiscuously daily reports, codes, and other things of these various Government agencies.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. LANHAM. Well, of course, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD serves a different purpose, but these various reports we can get upon request, when we wish them, and the sending of them to Members of Congress and broadcast over the country to be thrown into the wastebasket must involve considerable expense from the standpoint of material, of the employees in making these printed or mimeographic reports, and also from the standpoint of distribution through the mail. It seems to me that there is an element of economy that might well be observed in restricting this activity to absolutely necessary distribution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has expired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 15 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. I suppose that my experience is the same as the experience of all Members of Congress—that we receive daily a great many of these reports for which we have no need, and which we can get upon request. It seems to me that this matter ought to be brought to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations in the annual supply bills, upon which we are soon to pass, in order that there may be curtailment of unnecessary expenditure in this regard. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. No doubt the gentleman has put his finger on some abuses in our Government. These abuses, however, apply to the older departments, the regular established departments of the Government which sometimes engage in unnecessary and uncalled-for propaganda. I am thoroughly in accord with any effort to have a proper investigation made and the evil remedied as quickly as possible. In this bill, however, the entire amount carried is to do necessary printing. They have not yet reached the propaganda stage.

Mr. LANHAM. May I say to my colleague, Mr. Speaker, that I have not predicated my inquiry upon the provisions of this particular bill. I recognize the necessity for the appropriations made here.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BACON. As I understand it, these supplemental appropriations simply permit these activities to be carried on upon the same scale as they will be carried on after the 1st of July, in accordance with the independent offices bill recently passed by the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's statement is very nearly correct. The deficiency bill now before the House does not carry quite enough funds to enable them to carry on upon the same standard they will be using after the beginning of the next fiscal year which was provided for in the independent offices appropriation bill passed the other day.

Mr. BACON. And the appropriations we are considering today provide simply the money necessary to carry on these activities to the 1st of next July.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Correct. The next item, Mr. Speaker, is that for the National Railroad Adjustment Board. The estimate was $150,000. We allowed the estimate.

Just a few words of explanation regarding this Board. It was created at the last session of Congress. It is not a governmental board. The members of this Board are not employees of the Federal Government. They consist of 36 men. Eighteen of the members are selected by the railroad employee organizations and 18 are selected by the railroads themselves. Their duties are to prevent and adjust disputes growing out of the construction of labor agreements and to settle other disputes that arise between the carriers and their employees before they reach the stage of a strike.

The railroads pay the salaries of their 18 representatives and the brotherhoods pay the salaries of their 18 representatives. The total amount of the salaries paid by these organizations will amount to between $275,000 and $280,000. The bill we passed last session creating this Board provided that the Government should furnish the Board with its staff, its rent, heat, and light. This appropriation of $150,000 is to comply with that promise translated into law at the last session of Congress as the Government's contribution toward the prevention of these industrial disturbances that sometimes cost so much.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman know what the Board has accomplished thus far? Have they settled any dispute?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand 50 or 60 grievances, perhaps most of them of minor importance, have been adjusted. I call attention further, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that should this Board become deadlocked on any question, the Mediation Board selects a referee to break the deadlock, and both sides must comply with the settlement. What better system could we have to prevent railroad strikes in this country?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BACON. As I understand, the independent offices appropriation bill carried $156,000 to cover the activities of this Board for the fiscal year beginning the 1st of next July.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Then, why is $150,000 needed for this activity from now until the 1st of July, a period of only 6 months?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Answering the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I may say this Board never has had any appropriation.

Mr. BACON. How much are they in debt?

Mr. BUCHANAN. They borrowed $20,000 from the Mediation Board. They borrowed $6,400 from the railroads. On the basis of their credit they contracted for about $17,000 worth of furniture. Also, the Board is committed for rent. Therefore, out of this $150,000 they have already obligated over $56,000. It is contemplated they will hire 56 employees. Additional furniture must be bought. Furniture, of course, is not a recurring item to come out of the appropriation for next year.

Mr. BACON. The gentleman really thinks they need the full $150,000 from now to the 1st of next July?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I certainly do; and I may say to my colleague that this $150,000 is a recognition by Congress and a contribution by this Government in response to the interest the public has in preserving our transportation system in operation and intact at all times, while dealing equitably in every instance with the employees.

The other item, and there is only one, is that for the Securities Exchange Commission. There is no use going into that. It was discussed here fully the other day. The estimate for salaries and expenses was $975,000. We cut that estimate $150,000. This places the Commission upon the same proportionate basis for the balance of this fiscal year that they will be on during the next fiscal year under the appropriations made in the independent offices appropriation bill.

Mr. Speaker, the committee has gone into this carefully and the committee believes the amounts carried in this appropriation bill are necessary and ought to be passed.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the first item in the bill, the Federal Communications Commission, calls for an increase in the force of the Commission from approximately 121 in the main office in the District of Columbia to 402.

The old Radio Commission had a force of approximately 121. The new Communications Commission will have a force of 402. Frankly, I previously felt, when the independent offices bill was on the floor, that this was too large an increase. I believed that they ought to be able to get along with considerable less, and I offered at that time an amendment which would reduce the appropriation by 20 percent. Of course, that amendment was not agreed to. I feel that this one could undoubtedly be cut 20 percent, and it would still provide funds permitting this Commission to function properly.

It is a new activity, and they are going into the rates and the capital structure of the telephone and telegraph companies in this country. This activity, in my opinion, could be accomplished entirely with less money, but they are going along with it, and we have to see the results obtained in years to come.

The second activity, that of the Board of Mediation, I do not think presented sufficient justification to cover $150,000. I think undoubtedly they could have covered all of their activity with $110,000. However, I shall not offer an amendment, because I do not believe that we would succeed in putting across such an amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. In connection with the Mediation Board, what new and additional work have they to do over the old Board?

Mr. TABER. They have a lot of work to do in addition to what the old Board did, because they have included the 36 members of the Railroad Adjustment Board, 18 of whom are paid by the railroads and 18 of whom are paid by the employees, but the entire clerical and stenographic force, as well as the referees, if they have to have a fifth party on a board, the two representing each side not being able to agree, have to be paid by the Government.

Mr. SNELL. How much additional cost is this Board going to involve annually over the old Board?

Mr. TABER. Oh, probably $175,000 to $200,000.

Mr. SNELL. What was the total cost of the old Board; does the gentleman remember?

Mr. TABER. I have not the figure here, but as I remember it, somewhere around $125,000.

Mr. SNELL. This is more than double?

Mr. TABER. Oh, yes; there is no question about that.

Mr. SNELL. This is not reducing the Government cost very much?

Mr. TABER. The only advantage is a provision in the act, which could have been put in the old act, requiring the Board to stay in session until they agree. This was probably a good provision.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I understood there were some divisions in the Board of Mediation that were brand new, and that these have been operating since the last Congress without having any appropriation or funds available. Will the gentleman explain just what these functions are?

Mr. TABER. Yes. That is the National Adjustment Board which I just described. There are 18 railroad representatives and 18 employee representatives on this Board. These people have been paid up to this time, and they will be paid in the future, by the railroads and by the employees, but their expenses, such as rent, stenographic and clerical force, and the expense of these referees who may be called in, although none have as yet been called in, to act as arbiters where these boards that are set up of two representing each side cannot agree, are paid by the Government.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. I think probably $110,000 would cover everything that these people would need; however, it is a new activity and they will have to work out their own record.

The Securities and Exchange Commission is practically a new activity. There were about 100 employees transferred to it from the Federal Trade Commission. They are building up a force now to about 600. You cannot tell exactly, because there was $150,000 cut off this appropriation and approximately $300,000 was cut off the estimate which called for 658 employees sent in here by the Budget for the fiscal year 1936 in the independent offices bill. I think the committee did right in cutting $150,000 off the appropriation for salaries and expenses here, because they will have plenty of money with which to function. The activity of this Commission which ought to be of the most use to the public is the checking and preventing of the peddling of securities from door to door by agents amongst the unsuspecting people of this country. That is where the greatest abuse has been found to lie and where the people are being swindled the most. I hope with these funds they will be able to come in here and show a considerable curtailment in the operations of the swindlers who have been working on the public in this way. Frankly all of these activities represent a tremendous increase in boards, commissions, and employees in the civilian forces of the Government. The increase here over the former operations of the Trade Commission is approximately 600 percent. The activities are somewhat enlarged, but, frankly, I believe after they get organized we will find if we examine the matter closely that they could get along with a great deal less. I believe that the activities of the Communications Commission could be carried on with a great deal less.

I deplore the continual bringing in of deficiencies. We ought to better accommodate ourselves to original appropriations in the regular bills. These are, of course, new activities, but nevertheless we ought to get to the point where we can keep these things down and not be everlastingly increasing them.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FISH: On page 2, at the end of line 19, add "Provided, That no public official receiving pay from the Federal Government, or member of his or her immediate family, shall receive any pay or compensation for speaking over the radio."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make the point of order it is not germane and is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, this is just a limitation on the expenditure of the money.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which reads as follows:

Provided, That no public official receiving pay from the Federal Government, or member of his or her immediate family, shall receive any pay or compensation for speaking over the radio.

It will be observed that this amendment applies to all public officials and is not confined to those for whom this appropriation is made. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order on the ground it is not germane.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3973) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia, and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; and pending that I should like to arrange for some division of the time in general debate. What arrangement can be made as to time, may I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the chairman of our subcommittee that we run along this afternoon with general debate and defer any definite agreement as to time until we see how we make out during the afternoon?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Then, Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate this afternoon be equally divided and controlled, one-half by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. That is agreeable to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3973, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, before I discuss the provisions of the bill, I want to mention a widespread propaganda now misleading people of the United States.

I refer to the Townsend pension plan. I am in favor of a reasonable, sane, old-age pension. I want to see a proper old-age pension bill passed, one that will care for the aged, who are unable to work, who are dependent and have no income and no one to take care of them—a reasonable pension bill that would pay them at least $20 a month and as much as $35 a month to a man and his wife. That is about the figure heretofore recognized as just by this Government.

I want to see that kind of a bill passed in this session of Congress, initiated and passed by the Representatives of the people who have more interest in our constituents back home than any Dr. Townsend you can find between Maine and California.

Who is Dr. Townsend that he should have more interest in the people of the United States than you chosen Representatives of those people? Is Dr. Townsend interested in aged people or in what he gets out of them? At a later date I will furnish you some interesting facts on this subject.

I have some documents here that I want to put in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, both now and later, so, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and put in certain excerpts to which I shall refer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks and include therein certain excerpts. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I have some very interesting disclosures which I have received from Dr. Townsend's California office, which shows that his business is in thriving condition financially.

TOWNSEND RECEIPTS LAST OCTOBER $750,000

I quote from a letter received from Townsend's office last October, the letterhead having at the top "Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd.", and "The Townsend Plan", there being printed on it "F. E. Townsend, M. D., Founder and President" and "R. E. Clements, Secretary and Treasurer", and dated from "Long Beach, Calif., 148 American Avenue, October 15, 1934", and addressed to me at Abilene, Tex., the following admissions signed by Dr. Townsend's secretary, to wit:

With reference to the Townsend Clubs which are being organized throughout the Nation, the only demand of members is that they purchase a booklet at 25 cents, giving a complete analysis of the plan.

It may be of interest to you to know that we have several million signatures on our petitions and this is not omitting your own good State of Texas.

If, as stated by Dr. Townsend's office, on October 15, 1934, he had "several million members" and the only demand he made on them was to require that they pay him 25 cents each for a pamphlet, it is a mere matter of calculation to find out what are his receipts. When I pinned one of his employees down as to what was meant by "several million" he said it meant over 3,000,000. Well, 3,000,000 members at 25 cents each amounts to $750,000 that Dr. Townsend received from them up to October 15, 1934. And he must have received quite a sum from them since that date.

The Washington press reports that Dr. Townsend, with his staff, are quartered at the Ambassador Hotel. It is the aged poor of the United States who are paying his hotel bills.

I have some very interesting data sent me by one of Dr. Townsend's former employees in California, telling about the use of these funds by Dr. Townsend, and at the proper time I will place the contents of this employee's evidence before my colleagues.

Dr. Townsend says that his plan is for the Government to pay $200 per month to every person in the United States over 60 years of age, and he claims that there are only 8,000,000 such persons. Taking his own figures, that would mean that our Government would have to raise for this item alone the stupendous sum of $1,600,000,000 each month, or the aggregate of $19,200,000,000 per year for civilian pensions.

Why, for the last fiscal year the total revenues of the Government amounted to only $3,700,000,000, yet for old-age pensions alone Dr. Townsend would pay out each year $15,500,000,000 more than the entire revenues of the Government amounted to during the last fiscal year.

I quote the following from the Washington Post of Sunday, January 13, 1935:

TAX REVENUES AT PEAK LEVEL IN UNITED STATES HISTORY

Government tax collections, aside from those on incomes, are running at the highest levels in history.

Miscellaneous internal revenue, which comprises such taxes as beer and liquor, gasoline, "nuisance levies", and tobacco, running at the rate of $1,710,000,000 annually, are accounting for nearly a half of the Government's total revenues of approximately $3,700,000,000 annually.

With our total revenues amounting to only $3,700,000,000 per annum, Dr. Townsend would have this Government pay out each year $19,200,000,000 in old-age pensions alone. Where would the Government get the money? How would the Government get the money?

Dr. Townsend is short in his estimate of cost, just as he would be short in raising the money. Our expert actuaries and census authorities say that to pay $200 per month to every person in the United States over 60 years of age would require at least $24,000,000,000.

The Associated Press last Monday stated that the American Magazine would carry a statement by Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor, denouncing the Townsend plan as unsound, stating it would cost $2,000,000,000 per month, or $24,000,000,000 per year, and that its supporters are utterly reckless in their figures. Yet, as I do, Secretary Perkins favors a sane, old-age pension.

In the Washington Post last Sunday, January 13, 1935, respecting what Dr. Townsend's plan would cost the District of Columbia alone, appeared the following:

ANNUAL COST TO CAPITAL TAXPAYERS FIGURED AT $106,000,000

Lusk, who is secretary of the Washington Taxpayers Protective Association, said the Townsend plan would cost the taxpayers of Washington more than $106,000,000 a year.

"In other words", he said, "the total outlay will be three times the present cost of the District government and approximately 35 percent of all the money made by every man, woman, and child in Washington.

In order to pay $200 per month to every person in the United States over 60 years of age, costing the Government $24,000,000,000 a year, you would have to place our entire Membership of 435 Congressmen on the Ways and Means Committee and let them sit 24 hours a day, 365 days in the year, to devise every scheme known to tax experts in order to raise taxes sufficient to pay even half of this $24,000,000,000 a year.

Dr. Townsend says he is going to raise it by a sales tax. You are not going to let that burden be put upon the shoulders of the people. [Applause.]

You remember the Canadian trip of Mr. Hearst, where they had plenty to eat and plenty to drink, with plenty of entertainment along from Broadway, all financed in efforts to have a sales tax put upon the backs of the people. You did not stand for it. We killed it by a tremendous vote here in this House. Remember how our colleague, LaGuardia, helped us in that fight?

Mrs. KAHN. He is standing for it now.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. LaGuardia helped BOB DOUGHTON when he led the fight against such a tax on this floor. And we killed the sales tax, and that fight helped to make LaGuardia mayor of New York.

Mrs. KAHN. He is putting one on now.

Mr. BLANTON. That was put onto him by his advisers. You know some advisers of men in authority do much to ruin them. It was the advisers of Woodrow Wilson who caused his premature death. It was advisers of Harding who ruined him. They have ruined many men.

I am advising my constituents that the Townsend plan is nothing in the world but bunk, pure and simple, for them not to let him get any of their money.

Now, I want to mention another subject. Are we going to be able to spend our way back into prosperity by voting and spending billions of dollars for our unborn posterity to finance and pay hereafter? Are we going to bring back normalcy in industry, in business, in that way? I am going to say some things now that I don't believe another man in this House will say. I am going to tell you what I think. Some of you may think as I do, but you won't talk as I do. If we would repeal that foolish law that Congress passed that took from the courts of the United States the power of injunction to stop violations of law, to stop murder, to stop the destruction of property, when labor unions are destroying and murdering, and if we would provide safe means for all labor to work under, provide proper environment, provide, if you please, a proper wage scale, a scale that would permit living under the American standard of living, and then if we would write on every signboard in the United States that from now on the head of every business enterprise in the United States is going to be permitted to run his own business, according to law, and that if he wants to work men who are not union men he has the right to do it if they want to work for him, and that no organization in the world has a right to force his workers against their will to unionize. If we would do these things, we would restore business in the United States, and if Europe too, would wake up and adopt that policy, we would restore business in the whole world, because business will not be restored to normalcy as long as you have some outsider running it. [Applause.]

Some of you think you cannot make that kind of a speech and come back here, but you can. I have been making that kind of a speech for 18 years. My district is as thoroughly organized as any other district in the United States, from the union standpoint, but most of the union men I represent are thinking men, they are men of intelligence, they believe that a worker has the right to join a union, or not to join, just as he pleases. And they do not like taking orders from others. Note the following that appeared in this morning's Washington Post:

PLANT CLOSES, 1,100 JOBLESS WEEP IN VAIN—TEARS OF MERCHANTS AND WORKERS FAIL TO STAY MILL'S LIQUIDATION

BOSTON, January 15.—The pleas and tears of Southbridge workers and merchants today failed to save the jobs of 1,100 employees of the Hamilton Woolen Co., one-fifth of the community's employable population, as stockholders of the corporation overwhelmingly voted for liquidation, 26,589 to 815.

"These people will be thrown upon the world helpless as babes", George W. Grant, resident of Southbridge and stockholder, asserted tearfully. After declaring that the community had been built "in great measure by the company" and that adjacent towns, with an aggregate population of from 40,000 to 50,000, would be affected, Grant begged for further consideration.

He declared that after "mingling" with the workers, he knew 95 percent would return if not influenced by "outside organizers, who would sacrifice Southbridge or even Boston, to obtain their own ends."

Note that 95 percent of these 1,100 employees wanted to work on, and that it was outside organizers who prevented them and caused the plant to close. Thus 1,100 Americans are kept from working and from earning an honest living for their families because outside organizers interfered with their business, and interfered with the business of this plant, and closed the plant up. That is the secret of all of our trouble; that is what has stagnated business; that is what is keeping us in a depression; and we will be in a depression until we stop these outside organizers from meddling in other people's business.

Here is our colleague from New York [Mr. BLOOM]. Sol is a contractor. He hires men to lay brick. Suppose there are five bricklayers Sol employs and all but one of them can lay 1,200 bricks a day, and they like to lay 1,200 bricks per day, and get paid for it, but the fifth man can lay only 600 bricks per day, and the union will not allow them to lay more than 600 bricks. The four men are thus handicapped by the one who can lay only 600 bricks a day. Sol puts them to work on a wall. They begin to lay the bricks, and the slow man holds back the other four. They are all paid the same wage. Sol is not permitted to pay one of them more than he pays the others. That is the system that is in vogue all over the United States. You cannot pay a man a premium for doing extra work.

The whole business structure of the world is based on competition. The man who can conduct the best business and give the people the most for the least money is the man who has heretofore succeeded in business, but now everything is standardized, with minimum production, minimum hours, maximum pay, on a basis where all of the workmen are equal, regardless of their prowess, their skill, and their ability to perform. You will never get back to normalcy under that sort of system.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does my distinguished friend realize that for the past 100 years every liberal and progressive measure which has emancipated labor has been forced by labor upon capital, and that capital has never voluntarily given of itself?

Mr. BLANTON. Do you know that when I practiced law, and fought in courthouses for men's rights, I have always represented the under man, the little man as against the big one?

I have never represented a monopolistic corporation. I have represented the individual. I know what their problems are. I have worked all my life. It does not hurt me to work 16 hours a day, and yet we have a proposition right here in the committee of our good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] to fix a 30-hour week in industry all over the country. That is what is stifling the country. That is what is stifling the world. You have got 4,000,000 men organized to the teeth. Before you can go into a primary all of their various organizations make you sign a questionnaire pledging yourself as to what you will do when Congress meets, if you are elected. If you do not pledge them, you do not get the approval of the union leaders here in Washington.

You are put on their blacklist, unless you give them a hundred-percent obedience. You cannot obey them like Bill Upshaw used to do, obey them 99 times and disobey them once. They will turn against you and beat you, unless you obey them 100 percent.

Mr. SIROVICH. How about the National Economy League?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I do not know any more about that than the gentleman does. [Applause and laughter.] The National Economy League is nothing to me; neither it nor any other league has any control over me. On this floor and in Congress I think and speak my own language and my own thoughts. I am not guided by any of them.

Let me quote you a news item from the Washington Herald of January 7, 1935:

UNIONS WILL HARASS UNORGANIZED BAKERS

A campaign of harassment admittedly designed to drive nonunion bakery trucks off the streets and unionize the entire baking industry here will be undertaken today by the two bakers' union locals.

Carrying instructions to trail all delivery trucks of the Barker Bakery, Inc., and Sunrise Bakery, Inc., both nonunion, 19 carloads of union men will assemble at Georgia Avenue and W Street NW. This form of picketing was evolved at meetings last week of Local No. 118 and Salesman Union No. 33.

Union leaders notified the police department of their plans and Inspector of Detectives Frank S. W. Burke cautioned all precinct commanders to watch carefully for violence or outbreaks.

The above is occurring in the Capital of the United States Government. Those 19 carloads of union men could destroy property, murder, and maim, and not a court in the land could enjoin them, because this Congress has passed a law, at union labor's command, to take the power of injunction away from the courts respecting union-labor troubles.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman believe that the administration's National Recovery Act has been a failure?

Mr. BLANTON. There are many things I do not like about it. Down at Moran, Tex., there was a splendid young fellow named Marcus H. Ward, who built up a nice little business selling some plumbing equipment and some farm equipment. He died in 1933 and his widow had to take charge of his business and carry on. Respecting the several commodities in her little store, they all come under a different code, and these code authorities come there regularly and collect from her on different commodities before she is allowed to sell them.

She was controlled by one code authority on the few plumbing articles she sold and had to pay them an assessment. Then she was controlled by another code authority on the few farm articles she sold and had to pay them an assessment. Here is the receipt for what she paid them:

TEXAS—RECEIPT NO. 812

OCTOBER 17, 1934.

Received from Marcus H. Ward, Moran, Tex., $5. It is agreed that this payment will be deducted from the regular assessment which will be made under the terms of the approved budget of the divisional code authority.

DIVISIONAL CODE AUTHORITY FOR THE PLUMBING CONTRACTING DIVISION OF THE CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY.

E. G. BUELTAMAN,
Agent of the State Executive.

And, Mr. Chairman, I want every colleague in this House to now read the voluminous rules and regulations which this code authority, respecting the retail farm-equipment trade only and regarding a small business embracing only a few occasional sales, served on this widow and to which she was forced to comply in order to keep from being prosecuted, to wit:

CENTRAL CODE AUTHORITY, RETAIL FARM-EQUIPMENT TRADE (WESTERN DIVISION), 400 WEST MADISON STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.

Authorized by the National Recovery Administration

OFFICIAL ASSESSMENT NOTICE

OCTOBER 15, 1934.

To: Marcus H. Ward, Moran, Tex.

Code in force: In conformity with the provisions of the Retail Farm Equipment Code, all legal requirements having been met, you are hereby notified that the code is in full effect and that authority has been issued to the retail farm-equipment trade, through its central code authority, to administer and enforce this code. From now on this trade has the right to govern itself, subject to Government supervision as provided in the code, which is the law of our industry.

Assessment authority and notice: By the authority contained in article IV, section C, of the code approved by the President and Administrator January 6, 1934, and amendment 1, approved June 7, 1934, and of the basis of assessment and budget of necessary expenses approved by the Administrator July 2, 1934, you, as a farm-equipment dealer, are hereby notified of your legal assessment for your share of the expenses incident to the preparation, administration, and enforcement of the code on the following approved basis:

New basis of assessment approved July 2, 1934: One-tenth of 1 percent (decimal form .001) on your retail sales volume of farm equipment, using as a base for this year your retail sales volume for 1933.

(NOTE.—This form, by order of the Administrator, July 2, 1934, supersedes the old basis announced earlier to the trade of $10 for the first $25,000 sales volume and $5 for each succeeding $25,000 or major fraction thereof.)

What 1933 volume covers: In estimating your 1933 volume use only that part of your sales volume as described in article II, section A, of the code, which reads as follows:

"Retail (sales) of all equipment and repair parts for the operation, upkeep, and development of the farm, including raising, harvesting, and storing of crops, dairying, stock and poultry raising, or any other agricultural pursuit."

Instructions: On the above basis fill out the following form in duplicate. Mail the original to this office. File the duplicate for your protection. Pay by check, money order, or cash. Make checks payable to David E. Darrah, executive manager.

Fill out this volume form: I/we hereby certify that to the best of my/our knowledge, my/our retail sales volume of farm equipment for 1933 as described in the code was $———.

Fill out this assessment form: My/our assessment on the above volume for 1933, at the authorized rate of one-tenth of 1 percent, is $———.

Receipt for payment: It is understood that when my assessment is received by the central code authority, western division, formal receipt for it will be sent to me.

CODE ASSESSMENT RIGHTS AND REQUIREMENTS ISSUED BY THE CENTRAL CODE AUTHORITY, RETAIL FARM-EQUIPMENT TRADE (WESTERN DIVISION), JULY 1934

Under the administration orders for mandatory assessment as provided in amendment 1 of the code, the following statement is made for your guidance and protection:

1. The budget for the western division for all code costs of preparation, administration, and enforcement in the 33 States in this division has been submitted to the Administration and approved July 2, 1934. Copy of budget may be secured from this office.

2. The basis or rate of assessment has been submitted to the Administrator, and approved July 2, 1934, as just and equitable for this trade.

3. Payment of assessment must be made within 30 days from date assessment notice is received. Failure to pay within 30 days, no notice of protest as specified in paragraph 4 having been filed, becomes a code violation for you, punishable as such, and legal action for collection can be started and carried through.

4. You have the right of protest within 15 days from date assessment is received on the grounds of (1) the basis of assessment is unjust as applied to you; (2) the basis of assessment is not being followed by this office; (3) you are already contributing to another code embracing your principal line of business; or (4) any other valid reason.

5. You pay code assessment only for "that part of your trade which embraces your principal line of business, subject to such exceptions as N. R. A. may provide."

EXCEPTION 1. HARDWARE AND IMPLEMENT DEALERS

By agreement between the central code authority, retail farm equipment trade, the National Recovery Administration, and the board of governors of the retail hardware trade, the following assessment rule for 1934 shall govern assessments for hardware and implement dealers only.

"Any retail hardware dealer whose sales of farm equipment for 1933 exceeded a total of $2,500 shall pay the minimum assessment presented by the code authority of the retail farm-equipment trade." The words "minimum assessment" means the exact amount figured on your retail sales at the rate of one-tenth of 1 percent.

6. Your statement on page 1 of your 1933 sales volume and total assessment will be accepted as correct unless evidence to the contrary develops. In such a case the central code authority reserves the right to check your books for the correctness of your sales figures.

DAVID E. DARRAH,
Executive Manager.

BASIC FACTS COVERING APPLICATION, ADMINISTRATION, AND COMPLIANCE OF THE RETAIL FARM EQUIPMENT CODE ISSUED BY THE CENTRAL CODE AUTHORITY, WESTERN DIVISION, AUGUST 25, 1934

The code is law: The code is now the law of the retail farm-equipment trade under the National Recovery Act. It was written by your legally elected central code authority, composed exclusively of farm-equipment dealers, elected at your Government's suggestion by the Farm Equipment Dealers' Trade Associations, representing a preponderance of the retail farm-equipment trade. Your Government acted as an advisor to protect the rights of the public.

The code has been approved by the President of the United States and by the National Recovery Administrator, and ordered into operation as the law of our trade. It is now in the hands of the implement dealers of the United States of America for administration and enforcement, making it possible for this trade of ours to govern itself, and become of greater service to agriculture and more profitable for you through the elimination or control of vicious trade practices, which have made your business unprofitable.

Who comes under the code? Every retail farm-equipment dealer is liable under all provisions of the code. By order of the Administrator June 29, 1934, and again confirmed and explained by the Administrator's statement on August 6, 1934, it was ruled that—

1. Retail farm-equipment dealers are not engaged in strictly local business.

2. Such dealers are engaged in business covering a wide field in the country surrounding the towns in which they operate.

3. Such dealers are usually in competition with dealers located in other towns for their consumer trade.

4. Therefore, all retail farm-equipment dealers, regardless of the size of the town in which they operate or size of their retail sales volume, are subject to all provisions of the retail farm-equipment code, including all assessment, wage and labor, and fair-practice provisions.

(NOTE.—By this ruling retail farm-equipment dealers in towns of less than 2,500 population are not exempted from any of the provisions of the code.)

Who pays assessments? All retail farm-equipment dealers are liable for assessment and are governed by the above Administrator's orders. Failure to pay within 30 days is a code violation, punishable as such. (See p. 2 of your assessment form for explanation, limitations, and right of appeal.)

What is the code? The code is a law under the N. R. A., making a legal statement, approved by the President and the Administrator, of—

1. A plan for trade self-government by farm-equipment dealers like yourself.

2. A statement of approved trade practices for you to follow, with a method of protecting and perpetuating them.

3. A statement of the most vicious evils for you to avoid, with a method for controlling or eliminating them.

4. A plan for administering, enforcing, and financing the code, in which you have a share.

5. A method for changing or amending the code to solve new problems, for your protection and the advancement of the trade.

6. Full protection for the consumer, for labor, and for the general public whom you serve.

Official copy of the code will be mailed to you upon request. Study it carefully. It is your trade law for your protection.

How is code administered by the trade? With the approval of the Administrator, a complete administration and enforcement organization of implement dealers is being set up by your code authority in all States composed of:

1. Regional boards of implement dealers.

a. One for the East.

b. One of the Middle States.

c. One for the Pacific area.

2. Regional or State committees.

a. One for each State or trade territory. All composed of implement dealers.

3. Local committees.

a. One for each local trade territory, composed of one or more counties. There are over 400 of these committees, all composed of implement dealers.

These boards and committees have authority and jurisdiction for administration and enforcement in their respective territories. Any cases of violation which these boards and committees are unable to settle may be passed on by them to the N. R. A. for trial in courts of law. These courts have the power to fix penalty, including fines and imprisonment, if the case in question so warrants it.

How will complaints be made? Regular legal complaints forms will be furnished you from this office or by any of the above committees or by the secretary of your implement dealers' association. Your name as complainant will be held in confidence.

How are violations handled? A complete manual for procedure for handling complaints has been written, with the approval of the Administrator, outlining exact steps to be taken and the authority delegated to the above boards and committees. Copies of this manual will be available for you at this office or from any farm-equipment association secretary or from any of the above compliance boards or committees covering your territory.

Who should make complaints? The code applies to all dealers. Its enforcement on all dealers makes it effective and protects you in your efforts to live up to its requirements. You are injured; your trade is demoralized; the entire industry suffers, when a dealer is allowed to violate the code without being called to account. Enforcement of this code is now in the hands of all implement dealers. You should consider it your duty to yourself and the trade to lay the facts of provable violations before your local compliance committee.

How can conciliations be conducted? The best and most constructive permanent improvement under our code will come through conference and conciliation when dealers meet together to discuss their problems and agree on workable plans under the code. Most violations will be through ignorance of the meaning of the code. Dealers who have violated the code can, in most cases, be instructed at such meetings and their loyal cooperation received.

Who will levy assessments? All assessments must be levied by the central code authority at this office. No other assessment source will be authorized.

Who gets the Blue Eagle? Only dealers who pay their assessment and against whom formal violations have not been proved will receive a Blue Eagle. The Blue Eagle is the property of the Government. It will be removed in all cases of proven violation. Your Blue Eagle will be mailed from this office when your assessment is paid.

How will I figure overhead costs? Under the code retail sales price is wholesale invoice, plus freight, plus overhead. To protect yourself you must know your own individual overhead sales costs. Overhead must be figured on a uniform basis for all dealers. As required in the code and with the approval of the Administrator, we have prepared for you a uniform cost-accounting system covering all items that must be covered in your cost. This plan will be printed as soon as approved by the Administrator and furnished you from this office or from the above boards or committees. In the meantime, where the manufacturers' list price is lower than your individual overhead, plus invoice price, plus transportation costs, you may use it as your retail price.

How will I get code information? The regular trade press has been named official medium for code information. The latest code rulings, interpretations, etc. appear in each issue. You should keep a file of one good trade paper for your own information and protection.

What place is there for local dealers' group meetings? Local club or group meetings of dealers at regular intervals is the very heart of code work. Under the code administration and compliance set-up provision has been made for such local meetings. The secretaries of your State implement dealers' associations have already held hundreds of such meetings. You should attend these meetings and invite your competitors to attend with you. It is your job to keep yourself posted.

Where do implement trade associations fit in? The Government recognized the fact that the implement dealers' associations in the eastern and the national federations represented a preponderant number of all implement dealers and turned over to them the preparation of the code and the setting up of the central code authority. These associations, through their members, have given much time to this work. The central code authority delegated to the associations authority to organize the final administration and enforcement set-ups for all States, under the plan approved by the Government, and thus avoided setting up an organization of scores of field secretaries at prohibitive expense. They are doing this work in splendid shape. In addition, these trade associations have become clearing houses for all code information in a helpful and constructive way.

It is the policy of the central code authority to work as much as possible through implement trade associations that the benefits under the code may be preserved for the trade during the years to come. Every implement dealer should be a member of his trade association, and join in its work under the code, for the good of the trade and for his own benefit. We are building for tomorrow, not just for today.

DAVID E. DARRAH,
Executive Manager.

And respecting her few items of plumbing equipment, there was another voluminous set of rules and regulations served on her from the Plumbing Code Authority, and she was assessed and had to pay another fee to them, and her life is harassed by them.

In my old home town of Abilene, Tex., there is an enterprising American named " Spencer " who is in the oil business and running a little gasoline plant. He works a number of men under him. He does not produce the kind of gasoline that the Standard and other big companies produce. He manufactures a gasoline of a lower grade that he sells to farmers for their tractors and others; a gasoline that he must sell at a much cheaper price than these standard gasolines. The authorities wrote him and told him he could not sell that gasoline at all unless he sells it at the same price the Standard Oil Co. sells its gasoline.

When he is busy in the morning one of these little shirttail Federal agents from Washington will come down there and walk into his place of business and say, " I am a Federal inspector. Get your books out here. I want to see what you have been doing." They tell him they are going to bring him up before the authorities for underselling the big companies, and the first thing you know he will get tired of that Federal agent interference and he will go out of business. And then all of those men working for him are put out of jobs.

Remember the news item this morning about the plant closing near Boston and 1,100 men losing their jobs because some outside organizers interfered with other people's business. No business man is going to invest his time and money in a business that he cannot run himself. He does not want some outsider running his business.

Those stockholders voted to go out of business. Why? They wanted the right to run their own business in this country.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman think that stockholders should have that power of life and death over the livelihood of workers?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I expected that. That is the kind of sharpshooting that any man has to stand for if he makes the speech I am making. The gentleman must not have been here when I began my remarks.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I was right here.

Mr. BLANTON. I began by saying that this Congress should provide proper laws to insure safe environment, safe and proper equipment, and for a standard wage that will permit the American standard of living, and that will insure the employees, in whom I am just as much interested as the gentleman is, to be protected. I have got just as many of them in my district as the gentleman has in his district, and every one of them votes down there, and I have to run the gantlet every time. I go down there with a blacklist from the union leaders in Washington, but the workers in my district reelect me every time. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does not the N. R. A. do what the gentleman is proposing should be done by Congress, or is it not supposed to do that?

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that we must stop this Federal agent interference with our people back home. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. BLANTON. There is another sharpshooter who probably has signed their questionnaires. He says, "Oh, yes; I will vote for it." [Applause and laughter.] I will guarantee that he has answered "Yes" on every questionnaire they have sent him before the primary. [Applause and laughter.]

A little Federal narcotic inspector came into my home city and went to the office of a splendid doctor, a high-class citizen, who had the confidence of every person who knew him. This little agent said to Dr. Glenn:

I am a Federal narcotic inspector. Get your books out here.

And when Dr. Glenn said:

I am busy right now and have patients waiting.

This agent replied:

That makes no difference; I want to see them now. Let your patients wait. I represent the Government up in Washington. Get your books out here.

He examined the books and said:

I find that on a certain date you overprescribed certain narcotics for Mrs. Glenn.

Yes; that's my wife.

The agent said:

Well, you prescribed too much.

And Dr. Glenn replied:

Oh, but my wife is on her deathbed, with no chance to recover. I am trying to make her last days as peaceful as possible. I am trying to stop that terrible pain she suffers.

And this agent arrogantly said:

It makes no difference; I have got to report you.

Then Dr. Glenn telephoned me and I told him to bring the narcotic agent down to my office. When the narcotic agent found I was going to report him he tried in every possible way to make me believe that he had not insulted Dr. Glenn.

Any doctor in the United States who willfully violates the narcotic laws ought to be sent to the penitentiary, but a high-class doctor who prescribes narcotics to stop the pain of a suffering woman, dying, ought not to have some little agent insulting him and reflecting on his character and standing.

I am getting tired of seeing the rights of American citizens trampled upon by little Federal agents from Washington, and I hope that our great President in the White House will take steps to stop it.

Mr. Chairman, it is an unpleasant task to provide appropriations for the District of Columbia. There is a continual growing clamor each year for more money. If the Budget Bureau, which is the financial agent of the President, were to approve all of the estimates, enlarged each year, requested by the numerous departments of the District government, the Washington people would be overburdened with unbearable taxes, unless the United States Government furnished a great part of the civic expenses for the people here, as it did for so many years in times gone by.

The District Commissioners annually prepare and present to the President's Budget their estimates for increased appropriations. With skillful auditors and experienced advocates they present their justifications. The Budget patiently hears them. The Budget annually grants them a million or more increases. But they are never satisfied. They immediately prepare a campaign to wage before the House Appropriations Committee. The five daily newspapers of Washington immediately begin to fire their big guns. Specially prepared articles at times covering several columns appear each day, reminding Congress that Washington people cannot vote, hence, therefore, they should not pay the taxes citizens in the States pay, and that the Government should grant them all of the money they seek out of the Treasury.

Of course, they never mention the fact that this 10 miles square was specially set apart for the use of this Government, as the seat of government for the United States of America. They do not mention that it was our wise forefathers who saw fit to provide that people who saw fit to reside in the seat and government, and acquire property here, and engage in business pursuits here, and enrich themselves by selling to, renting to, and dealing with Government officials and a hundred thousand Government employees, should not vote, unless they qualified in some State. This same restriction was placed upon 12,000 Army officers and 117,000 enlisted men in our Army. Yet they are taxed and pay their own civic expenses.

Just as soon as members of the committee having the District bill in charge reach Washington they are besieged by reporters from the five Washington newspapers asking for a declaration of intentions regarding all cuts the Budget might make respecting various estimates. If committeemen approve, they are statesmen and fine fellows. If they disapprove, they are attacked, and ridiculed, and belittled, and denounced, and misquoted, and misrepresented.

They lead the good citizens of Washington to believe that such members are unfriendly toward them, and have malice against them, and seek to injure them, when just the contrary is true, and such members are earnestly and sincerely trying to do their duty, and for their right arm would not treat the people of Washington unjustly.

Such misrepresentation of members of the committee by Washington newspapers causes Washington people unjustly to dislike said committeemen, and incites some people to threaten such members and to become their enemies, when there is no reason or excuse whatever for such a situation.

Just as soon as it is learned that the Appropriations Committee has refused to grant the amounts requested by the Commissioners, then resort is had to some Members of Congress not on the committee. The Public Utilities will appeal to some friend in Congress and request that he will lead a fight and offer amendments from the floor to increase appropriations. The school authorities will look up some special friend to some special officer or teacher and persuade him to make a floor fight to increase different items. The police department will urge some close friend in Congress to lead their fight on the floor and try for them to secure increases demanded. The fire department will have some friend to wage a battle in the House for increases they demand. In many cases the Members thus appealed to will know nothing about the facts or justifications, and nothing about the hearings or the patient consideration given by the committee to such matters. And a new burden is placed upon the members of said committee to resist such onslaughts made from the floor.

After the House passes the bill, and as soon as it reaches the Senate, the fight shifts over to that side of the Capitol. The Washington newspapers begin immediately to praise the Senators who will handle the bill there. They will be eulogized daily. Confident predictions will be made that they will grant back every cut the President's Budget made and will allow every cut made by the House of Representatives. And usually all such cuts are restored in the Senate, with practically no debate, and then to preserve the Budget action and to preserve the will of the House the House conferees must carry on their shoulders the burden of insisting on supporting the financial policy of the President.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. After I have discussed this bill I shall be glad to yield.

If you will look on page 26 of the hearings you will find that for 1905 the appropriations for the District of Columbia were $9,665,785; for 1910 they had grown to $10,528,291; for 1915 they had increased to $12,322,539; for 1920 to $16,329,-521; for 1925 to $27,682,067; while for 1930 they had increased to $44,540,115; but for 1934 we decreased the appropriations to $33,073,334, but for the present fiscal year of 1935 Congress appropriated $36,584,677.

This 1936 bill appropriates the sum of $39,308,404, and to carry out the recommendation of the President's Budget the Federal contribution is $5,700,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is not that contribution altogether too big?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not believe we should contribute anything. I will leave it to the gentleman to answer, and I will accept whatever the gentleman has to say about it.

Mr. TABER. It is $5,700,000. It seems to me it is altogether out of line with the lowest tax rate in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with my friend. I think the gentleman has sound ideas on everything except political matters. [Laughter.]

No man in this Nation loves his Capital more than I do. I am proud of it. I take great pride in showing it to my constituents when they come here. It is their Capital. I have had a small part in building it up during the last 20 years. I am proud of its 1,200 parks; I am proud of its magnificent buildings; I am proud of all of it. But it is a 10-mile square which was set apart by this Government for the transaction of the Government's business. Our forefathers saw fit to provide by law that the people who live here cannot vote unless they aline themself with State organizations. Our forefathers had the right to do that. The people who came here poor but who now are influential and rich because of the governmental plants here, knew that when they moved to Washington. They knew that when they fixed their domicile here and they came here with their eyes open. They knew what the law was; they knew they could not vote. They knew this was the seat of government.

For years and years in the matter of paving, in the matter of street improvement, in the matter of the sewer system, the water system, all the bridges, like the million-dollar Connecticut Avenue Bridge, the hospitals, the schools, everything here was paid for half by your constituents and half by Washington, 50-50. The Government paid half of it for a while and then they established a 60-40 basis. When I first came to Washington the tax rate was 90 cents on $100. It was raised then to $1.10 on the $100; then it got to $1.20; then it got to $1.30; and then $1.70. Last year the rate was $1.50 on the hundred.

All libraries owned by individuals are tax exempt. Whether your family library is worth $100 or $100,000, it is exempt from taxation. In addition to your library, there is $1,000 worth of household furnishings exempt from taxation in Washington.

Prior to 2 years ago I could name you piece of property after piece of property in Washington that was not assessed at 50 percent of what it would sell for, 50 percent of what the man would take for it, or 50 percent of what he gave for it. Of course, some of the property was assessed high, but, on the other hand, lots of it was not assessed for more than 50 percent of its actual value. Every time this Government seeks to take a piece of property the Washington people sit as a jury to assess damages. And we have cases where they made the Government pay 500 percent above its assessed value.

The hearings will show that the District Commissioners arbitrarily last year reduced the assessed values $80,000,000 and distributed this to the property owners of the District. This year they made another decrease of $50,000,000 on the assessed valuation.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. So that this year and last year the assessed value of property in the District of Columbia was arbitrarily reduced $130,000,000 to benefit the people of Washington.

The water charges were also decreased last year, and the District of Columbia has the finest water in the world. The average family pays $6.75 per year for 10,000 cubic feet of water. The Government owns the original water conduit in connection with this water system. You will not find finer water in the whole world than here in Washington.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman compare the tax rate here with other places?

Mr. BLANTON. It is less than the tax rate in any other comparable city in the whole world.

Now, take the sewer service. Where I live I pay $3 a month to my home city just for the sewer service. You pay nothing in Washington.

All school books and school supplies are furnished free to the children and many lunches are furnished free in the various schools. Instead of the age of admission to the schools being 7 years, as it is in some States, a child may be sent to the Washington schools at 5 years. They have nurses to look after the little fellows so that they will not bother their mothers and fathers at home.

Take all of these beautiful trees around the residences in Washington. Every one of them was furnished free. They do not have to pay anything additional to the $1.50 per $100 tax rate.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman discuss the rents here?

Mr. BLANTON. They are higher than in any other city in the United States.

The trees are sprayed free. They are pruned, and replaced when they die, without charge.

Take the gathering of ashes. I have to pay for that service at home. Here you do not have to pay anything extra. The same thing is true of garbage and trash. The gathering of garbage and trash is all free. That is, it is paid for out of the $1.50 tax rate.

Mr. SIROVICH. The rentals ought to be proportionately diminished.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. There is no income tax here like there is in some of the States. There is no inheritance tax here like there is down in my State.

In the District, whether your automobile is a Rolls Royce or Ford, you pay $1 registration fee for license tags. Here you pay $1 a year to get a driver's license; it is $3 for a 3-year license. Elsewhere it costs more.

The gasoline tax here is 2 cents. Over in Virginia it is 5 cents a gallon. Down in Tennessee, where our Speaker lives, the gasoline tax is 7 cents. I passed through some States this summer where the gasoline tax was 9 cents per gallon.

Now, I am not an enemy of the District. Some of the finest men in the world live here. I know the business men here and they are big, whole-souled fellows and good scouts. They are good companions and I have enjoyed myself with them. I go to their banquets and I like them all, and I do not believe that the newspapers that make this continual fight here represent the sentiment of the good people of Washington.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] asks whether I own any automobiles here. Yes; I have to keep two.

I keep a big car to show my constituents around the city. Many of my constituents come here. I also keep a little Ford work car to go to the departments. And besides I use many taxicabs. I have been to the departments this morning. It is a lot easier to jump in a cab than to send for your car and find a parking place. I have used taxicabs this morning. We have a provision here that keeps the 20-cent zone, the 30-cent zone, the 50-cent zone, and the 70-cent zone, and protects the people of Washington from being robbed by some of these cabs.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman from Texas, of course, is familiar with the taxicab bill introduced in the last session?

Mr. BLANTON. I voted for it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Can the gentleman very well justify that static rate of 20 cents and still compel these cabbies to buy a rather expensive kind of liability insurance?

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell the gentleman about that. I hope the gentleman will report that bill again, and I shall help to pass it. I voted for it the last time it was considered. It is a bill that provides liability insurance, and they ought to be put under liability insurance. When they have an accident here they ought to pay for any damage done. I want such a bill passed, and I am going to vote for it; and when you enact such a measure, instead of having 4,000 cabs here, which is 1,000 too many, you will have 3,000. This bill alone will take 1,000 bad cabs off of the streets—cabs that are run by irresponsibles.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield the gentleman from Texas 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. When you pass this bill you will take the irresponsibles off the streets, the ones who are causing most of the accidents, and the 3,000 taxicabs that will be left at 20 cents for the first zone will make a great deal more money than they are making now because more people will ride in them. Some people are afraid to ride in a taxicab now.

I could not use all this time without telling you of the splendid, patriotic, patient, loyal work that your chairman of this subcommittee [Mr. CANNON] and the other members have done; our good friend from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], our good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER], our good friend from Iowa [Mr. JACOBSEN], and the other members of this committee who have met with Mr. CANNON in the month of December, before you came here, working on this bill and trying to give you a good bill, fair to the District and fair to the Government of the United States. Mr. CANNON is a most valuable man to this Nation. He is one of the most valuable Representatives in Congress. I have served with him here and have been active with him for 18 years. He is a prince, and I am glad to follow him as my leader.

I do not want to be unfair to a single person in the District of Columbia. I have as many friends, close personal friends, among the people of the District as any man in this House. I know their hearts; they do not want gifts from their Government. They are not in favor of this newspaper propaganda.

Some of the newspapers here are fair respecting all matters except District appropriations. There are some fine newspaper men representing them. There is not a better newspaper in the United States than the Washington Star. In many instances the News is fair. But the Washington Post, the Washington Herald, and the Washington Times have all been very unjust to me. They have misrepresented me. They have attacked me without cause. They have tried to ridicule me because I would not obey their commands. They have tried to belittle me. They have incited Washington people unacquainted with the facts to dislike me, and to believe that I am their enemy, and to write me threatening letters. They have helped to stir up opposition to me in my district. They have helped to cause aspiring politicians in my district to run against me in every election during the past 18 years.

Within the past 2 weeks, influenced and incited by attacks against me in Washington newspapers, I have received numerous letters from Washington people announcing that they will see to it that I have opposition in the next election, and threatening me with defeat. I wish they knew just how little such threats scare me. I wish they knew just what opposition I have surmounted during the past 18 years. I have no fear of elections. I have no fear of political opponents. I perform my duty here with the confident realization that my loyal constituents back home will look after my interests. I have confidence in them. They have confidence in me. So such threats do not scare or deter me.

So that these people who threaten me with defeat may know how I stand with my constituents in my district I might mention that they kept me on their circuit bench 8 years; I then defeated Hon. J. M. Wagstaff for Taylor County's congressional candidate in a preferential primary February 5, 1916; then defeated Congressman W. R. Smith and Hon. R. N. Grisham for election to Sixty-fifth Congress in old Sixteenth District, then embracing 59 counties. After redistricting I was reelected in 1918 from new Seventeenth District, defeating Hon. Oscar Callaway (former Congressman), Hon. William G. Blackmon, and Hon. Joe Adkins; again defeated Grisham in 1920; again defeated Hon. Oscar Callaway, and also Ernest G. Albright, Prof. N. S. Holland, Hon. W. J. Cunningham, and Hon. Joseph B. Dibrell, Jr., in 1922; again defeated Albright in 1924; defeated Judge J. R. Smith in 1926, carrying all 19 counties; ran unsuccessfully for United States Senate in 1928, carrying 79 counties against field of 6 candidates, finishing 12 years in Congress on March 3, 1929; defeated widow of Hon. R. Q. Lee in special election May 20, 1930, for the unexpired term in the Seventy-first Congress; renominated in Democratic primary July 26, 1930, over Hon. Venus Earl Earp, district committeeman of American Legion, by majority of 23,000 votes; reelected to Seventy-second Congress in general election November 4, 1930, without opposition; defeated District Attorney Joe H. Jones in Democratic primary July 23, 1932; reelected without opposition November 8, 1932, to the Seventy-third Congress; defeated Carl O. Hamlin, district judge, and Oscar F. Chastain by a clear majority of 2,096 votes over both opponents in the Democratic primary election on July 28, 1934, carrying all 27 boxes in Chastain's home county of Eastland, all 30 boxes in my home county of Taylor, and every voting box in my old home county of Shackelford.

CONSTITUENTS APPROVE DUTY FEARLESSLY PERFORMED

At the time the State of Texas was last redistricted, Oscar F. Chastain, of Eastland, was in the State legislature at Austin and was chairman of the house redistricting committee. This gave him an inside advantage in framing congressional districts in Texas. He helped to engineer through the legislature a redistricting bill, specially framing up on me, which took from my Seventeenth District 10 of my splendid counties and added 3 new counties in which Chastain thought he had a special advantage, one being Erath, where he was born and had many influential relatives, and the others being counties in which he had taught school and had many acquaintances. After thus framing my district, Legislator Chastain immediately announced against me for Congress and began an active campaign.

District Judge Carl O. Hamlin, who for 13 years had been district judge at Breckenridge, and who while drawing a State salary of $5,000 per year had drawn retired pay, upon presumed disability, of $150 per month from the Government, being mad because I had helped to cut him and about 3,500 other retired officers off of the Government pay roll and stopped their drawing big pay for presumed disabilities, also announced against me and began a vicious campaign of abuse and misrepresentation.

Both Chastain and Hamlin used Washington attacks on me as their campaign slogans.

As a part of the game, a little irresponsible feature writer from Austin, named Raymond Brooks, went out to Abilene and Cisco, and without consulting Mr. G. Fisk, of the Abilene Times, or Mr. Bernard Hanks, or Mr. Max Bentley, or Mr. Frank Grimes, of the Abilene Reporter-News, all reputable newspapermen of Abilene, and without consulting Mr. B. A. Butler or Mr. W. H. LaRoque, of Cisco, reputable newspapermen there, Raymond Brooks sent telegraphic news dispatches from both Abilene and Cisco on March 21, 1934, bemeaning me, eulogizing my opponents, and predicting my defeat, and falsely asserted that—

Abilene people are keenly enlivened over the prospect of sweeping TOM BLANTON out of Congress this year—

And glowingly told how very popular Oscar Chastain was in his home county of Eastland, and asserted that—

Chastain was strong in BLANTON'S home city.

My opponents caused this false propaganda from Raymond Brooks to be reproduced in many newspapers in my district as news dispatches and paid advertisements.

They reproduced in newspapers many Washington attacks on me.

It was June 25, 1934, before I could finish my congressional duties here in Washington following the adjournment of the last session of Congress, and I had less than a month in which to campaign my new district before the primary of July 28, 1934.

Proving just the opposite of what Raymond Brooks had falsely predicted, I carried every voting precinct in my home city of Abilene against both opponents. I carried all 30 of the voting precincts of my home county of Taylor against both opponents. I carried all 27 of the voting precincts against him in Oscar Chastain's home county of Eastland. In Shackelford County, where I married in 1899, and in which I have not lived since 1908, I carried all nine of the voting precincts against both opponents. I carried all three of the new counties, Erath, Fisher, and Hamilton, which legislator Chastain placed in my new district, thinking it would give him an inside advantage over me. I carried the voting precinct of Bluff Dale, where Oscar Chastain was born. I carried several of the voting precincts in Judge Carl Hamlin's home county of Stephens.

The House having granted me authority to extend by printing excerpts, so that neither Raymond Brooks nor any other feature writer may ever again misrepresent the facts concerning the splendid support my home people give me, and so Washington enemies may know how futile their threats are, I want to show the exact vote in said counties, polled in the last Democratic primary election on July 28, 1934, to wit:

Certified vote in Taylor County

| Voting precinct | Thomas L. Blanton | Carl O. Hamlin | Oscar F. Chastain |

The foregoing is important to the people of the United States only for the purpose of showing that they cannot always rely on the reports these irresponsible feature writers broadcast in newspapers in an effort to injure a Congressman, and to show these enemies in Washington that their threats to defeat me do not scare me and do not deter me.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that any Congressman who will earnestly, faithfully, energetically, and conscientiously perform his duties here, without fear and without truckling, he has nothing to fear from his constituents. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I am taking advantage of this early opportunity to bring to the attention of the Committee and the country a resolution—House Joint Resolution No. 89—I have introduced which seeks to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to require a plebiscite before a declaration of war, except in the case of attack or invasion, and also to provide for conscription by the Government of war properties in the event of a declaration of war.

The objective of this proposed constitutional amendment is twofold. First, it gives to the rank and file of our citizenship who have to suffer and die and pay the awful costs of war the right to decide whether there shall be a war. Secondly, it takes the profits out of war, and by removing the incentive of those whose hellish business it is to foment wars minimizes the probability of wars in the future.

By exposing the machinations of the munitions manufacturers, President Roosevelt and Senator Nye are rendering a signal service to humanity. If the fruits of their efforts are to be permanently secured for the benefit of posterity, something more than a mere statute will be required. Nothing less than a constitutional amendment will suffice, and the purpose of the resolution I have proposed is to furnish this security to Americans for all time.

Seventeen years after the World War, which was supposed to be a war to save civilization, we need this proposed amendment to save civilization from the munitions manufacturers. Language is impotent to describe the diabolism that creates and fosters wars, with their cataclysm of sorrows, for the sake of dirty financial profits. Senator NYE's condemnation of this iniquitous practice sounded like the wrath of the Almighty when the Senator arose yesterday and made this statement:

> The munitions industry actually puts peoples and nations into war and then prolongs the conflict as long as it can because of selfish interest.

The statesmanship of America, without delay, and at the present session of Congress, should take bold and resolute steps to keep America out of future wars.

The world is in a state of economic and political ferment. Seeds of discord are being sown and there are ominous signs that a harvest of strife is in the making. War clouds are lowering on the horizon. Before it is too late, wise and well-considered action should be taken to prevent America's involvement in another war which the perfection of human invention will make the most terrible, the most deadly, the most devastating war of all time.

TEXT OF THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT

In my opinion, the best safeguard that can be erected to prevent America from being drawn into future wars is an amendment to the Constitution of the United States such as I am proposing, which provides for the adoption of a new article effective when the same shall be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. The proposed new article consists of two sections, as follows:

> SECTION 1. Except in the event of attack or invasion the authority of Congress to declare war shall not become effective until confirmed by a majority of all votes cast thereon in a Nation-wide referendum. Congress may by law provide for the enforcement of this section.
> SEC. 2. Whenever war is declared the President shall immediately conscript and take over for use by the Government all the public and private war properties, yards, factories, and supplies, together with employees necessary for their operation, fixing the compensation for private properties temporarily employed for the war period at a rate not in excess of 4 percent based on tax values assessed in the year preceding the war.

History shows that as a rule wars are seldom, if ever, the result of popular mandates but are caused by irresistible forces that drag nations into them. Section 1 of my proposed amendment provides that those whose lot it is to be torn from their families and to suffer and die in the event of war shall have a right to say whether there shall be war. That is elemental justice.

Section 2, by providing for the conscription by the Government of war properties in the event of war, will remove the profit incentive to war. Take the profit out of war and there will be few wars. If this section is adopted, the noble objectives of the splendid drive made by President Roosevelt and Senator NYE's committee to curb the unconscionable activities of munitions manufacturers who traffic in human misery will be permanently and securely fixed in the fundamental law of the land.

OBLIGATION WE OWE TO HUMANITY

In the present state of world affairs we owe to humanity no less than to posterity the adoption of this amendment or one similar to it. The agonized cries of war mothers whose sons sleep in the fields of France demand it, in order that they may know that their children did not die in vain. America's share of the direct cost of the World War was $36,000,000,000, or more than $50,000 for every day since Christ was born. The indirect cost in mental and bodily suffering, as well as in dollars, is incalculable. Eighty cents of every dollar wrung from the taxpayers for the regular expenses of government goes to pay for wars past and for preparation for wars to come. The depression through which we are passing, with its inconceivable vastness of human woe, is a backwash of war. If statesmanship has not entirely vanished from the earth, now is the time for it to assert itself, lest these things may occur again.

I shall expect to discuss this subject more fully later, and I am only bringing it up now to direct attention to the resolution I have introduced. That resolution has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS, is chairman. The resolution probably will fail to pass unless it is supported by a Nation-wide manifestation of favorable public opinion. I hope that all persons, groups, and organizations that are interested in this proposed amendment will take prompt action and will send their expressions to their respective Members of Congress, with copies to Judge SUMNERS and myself. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to incorporate therein a letter from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, together with a report from the Superintendent of Markets, Weights, and Measures.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, the matter to which I wish to call attention is of peculiar interest to the District of Columbia, to the people of Washington, and also to the tidewater sections of the States of Maryland, North Carolina, and Virginia. I refer to the condition of the wharves at the municipal fish market and to the need for replacement of the large wharf there which was demolished in 1932. In 1914 there were built three wharves, one known as the "large wharf" and two smaller ones. They were built out of an appropriation of $50,000. In 1932, because of the deteriorated condition of the largest wharf, it was necessary to tear it down. There are now only two of these wharves, and they are used very largely for agricultural and sea-food products which come from the Chesapeake and its tributaries and also from the waters of North Carolina. Those products come in by boats. The volume of these products brought in by boat is very large. These products embrace fish, oysters, watermelons, canned goods, potatoes, and truck products generally. The approximate average of these commodities which were delivered to the wharves during the last 4 years were: Fresh fish, 2,300,000 pounds; salt fish, 40,000 pounds; oysters in the shell, 45,000 bushels; watermelons, 250,000; potatoes, 50,000 barrels; canned tomatoes, 70,000 cases; grain, 10,000 bushels. Since the large wharf has been torn down, the facilities have been wholly inadequate. The president of the Board of Commissioners advised me that the engineer of the wharf committee informs him that the two existing piers at the fish market are in better condition than the pier which was demolished, and that some of the temporary timber supports which have been in service for 3 years will soon require replacement; also that the progressive concrete deterioration will require continued installation of additional new supports. The replacement of the upper pier within the next 2 years is essential if service at these piers is not to be further curtailed.

Mr. Chairman, since coming here this morning I have learned that there is an appropriation of $5,000 in the current bill for repairs to some piers. I have endeavored to find out if that appropriation refers to the two piers. I know it does not contemplate the replacement of the large pier. I am advised that it would take $20,000 to replace the large pier, and $20,000 additional to restore the existing two to first-class condition. The situation is now such that the small boats that come in sometimes lie two and three deep in tiers along these piers, and have to unload one across the other. It is important to the shipping public that there shall be ready access to these piers in order that these perishable products shall be unloaded quickly after they arrive here. Some of these commodities are sold to wholesalers, and others are sold to the retailer and to the consumer himself, thus serving to keep down the price of such articles to the consumer. Unless restoration is made of these piers it is probable that this trade will be lost. For my part I feel that Washington, located upon the Potomac River, with access to Chesapeake Bay, has a right to its development as a port to which its tributary territory may send its products.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman know, and I assume he does, that there is a comprehensive report on port improvement at the port of Washington, which involves, I think, a disbursement of about $3,000,000, recommended by the engineers, with local contribution, which involves the construction of these piers and various betterments and beautification of the water front.

I will say to the gentleman for his information that that report has gone as far, legislatively, as it can, and has been approved by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. BLAND. I think that is excellent.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman's mode of attack, I assume under the present set-up, would be the P. W. A.?

Mr. BLAND. It is not my purpose now to offer an amendment to this bill, because the appropriation desired by me has not been considered by the committee, and I think it would need committee consideration. However, it is my hope that this matter, having been brought to the attention of the committee, may be covered by an amendment offered in the Senate to this bill. I am afraid that this small project, that this necessary project, may be lost or materially delayed as part of the larger project. This work is so essential, in my opinion, that I would ask that these improvements be included in the regular appropriation bill and be provided for in the regular way.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say at that point, with the gentleman's permission, that the tonnage for the port of Washington, its importance, and the phase which the gentleman has so ably presented here justify this improvement.

Mr. BLAND. I think they justify the larger improvement, and I think they justify immediately the smaller improvement that I am asking for.

I call attention to the fact that after the loss of the largest pier the revenues fell off. In 1931 the revenues were $4,093.50; in 1932, $4,245; in 1933, $5,195.91; and then the superintendent reports that after the largest pier was demolished there was a decrease of $1,511.86 from the wharfage collected in the preceding year. There are now patronizing these wharves 76 principal shippers of oysters and fish from Virginia, Maryland, and North Carolina, 129 shippers of watermelons, 57 shippers of potatoes, and 17 shippers of canned tomatoes. The information which comes from the superintendent's office also shows that there has been a demand for lumber that could be imported at these piers. A considerable quantity of lumber has been shipped into Washington by boat and many concerns have desired dockage which could not be furnished, some of which will appear in my extension of remarks. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Availing myself of the permission to extend my remarks, I insert at this point a letter to me dated January 3, 1935, from the president of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the report submitted therewith.

Hon. S. O. BLAND,
Chairman Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLAND: Reply is made to your letter of December 24, 1934, in regard to the reconstruction of the upper pier at the municipal fish market on Water Street SW.

The engineer of the wharf committee informs me that the two existing piers at the fish market are in little better condition than the pier which was demolished and that some of the temporary timber supports which have been in service for 3 years will soon require replacement. Progressive concrete deterioration will also require continued installation of additional new supports. The replacement of the upper pier within the next 2 years is essential if the service of these piers is not to be further curtailed.

In regard to the volume of business that has been handled over these piers during the last few years, your attention is invited to the attached copy of a report by the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets.

Very sincerely yours,
M. C. HAZEN,
President Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

JANUARY 2, 1935.

In re facilities at fish wharves.

Commissioner HAZEN:

Report: In 1914 three concrete piers were constructed at the Municipal Fish Wharf and Market from an appropriation of $50,000 for that purpose. The three piers were each 60 feet wide and 100 feet, 120 feet, and 184 feet long, respectively. In 1932 the longest of the three piers, having been found upon examination by engineers to have become deteriorated to such an extent that it was unsafe, was torn down, leaving only the two small piers available for use. Examination of the latter piers by engineers indicates that they have disintegrated to such an extent that they are now unsafe for heavy loads, and that it will be necessary to replace them within 3 or 4 years.

The wharves in question are used largely for docking boats bringing fish, oysters, watermelons, potatoes, canned goods, and other miscellaneous farm products to Washington from eastern Virginia, southern Maryland, and eastern North Carolina. The volume of products brought in by boat from the sections named is quite large. The approximate average per year of commodities named delivered to the wharves during the last 4 years were:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Fresh fish | pounds | 2,300,000 |
| Salt fish | do | 40,000 |
| Oysters in shells | bushels | 45,000 |
| Watermelons | | 250,000 |
| Potatoes | barrels | 50,000 |
| Canned tomatoes | cases | 70,000 |
| Grain | bushels | 10,000 |

Fish, oysters, watermelons, and potatoes which are brought to the wharves by boat are sold at wholesale to merchants and to a considerable extent at retail directly to consumers. Maintenance of these wharves offers an outlet for such products coming from those sections of Virginia and Maryland not having convenient rail facilities and offer the cheapest possible means of transportation to the Washington market. Thus it is that people of the District of Columbia are able to obtain such products as are brought to the fish wharves at lower prices than from other sources. The existence of the wharves also maintains keen competition and effectively prevents any combination among local seafood dealers to increase prices. No other place is available for docking boats bringing such products to the District of Columbia market, hence maintaining adequate facilities at this point is extremely important and beneficial to the general public in the District.

Since one pier was torn down in 1932, as stated, facilities offered by the two remaining piers have been extremely inadequate for the proper accommodation of boats desiring dockage space. Only about 10 boats of the size usually coming to the wharves can dock at the 2 small piers now in use.

During most of the year, beginning August 1, 1933, and ending July 31, 1934, many more boats were at the wharves daily than could be accommodated with dockage space as indicated by the number of boats on the dates named as follows. For brevity, the number of boats is omitted. They show:

In August, 518 boats, ranging from 11 on 2 days to 28 on 1 day; in September, 519, ranging from 12 on 1 day to 32 on 1 day; in October, 199, ranging from 11 on 1 day to 17 on another day; in November, 293, ranging from 11 on 3 days to 25 on 1 day; in December, 315, ranging from 11 on 3 days to 23 in 1 day; in January 1934, 231, ranging from 11 on 3 days to 17 on 2 days; in March, 153, ranging from 11 on 2 days to 15 on 2 days; in April, 64, ranging from 11 on 1 day to 14 on 2 days; in May, 88 on 7 days, ranging from 11 on 1 day to 14 on 1 day; in June, 38, and in July, 185, ranging from 11 on 2 days to 18 in 1 day.

By reason of the present overcrowded conditions it is often impossible to furnish dockage space with any reasonable degree of promptness to boats desiring to unload commodities. It is not unusual for some of them to have to wait from 2 to 4 days before being able to obtain berths. It is often necessary for boats to tie up in from two to three tiers, and in such cases, in order to unload products at all, same must be carried across from one to two boats.

Prior to demolishment of the largest of the three piers, business at the wharves had, on the average, increased during the past several years as indicated by the amount of wharfage collected each year, as follows:

|---|---|
| 1931 | $4,093.53 |
| 1932 | 4,245.02 |
| 1933 | 5,195.91 |
| 1934 | 3,684.05 |

It will be observed that for the year ending June 30, 1934, after the larger wharf was demolished, there was a decrease of $1,511.86 in wharfage collected over the preceding year. This decrease is due largely to lack of sufficient accommodations for boats at the two existing piers.

(There follows the names of the principal shippers of oysters and fish, watermelons, potatoes, and canned goods, which, for brevity, are omitted.)

Prior to condemnation and demolishment of the large pier in 1932 a large amount of sugar was shipped to Washington, which docked at said pier. The average amount was about 6,000 tons per year, said to be more than one-half of the sugar used in Washington. Such shipments of sugar by boat were necessarily discontinued after the large pier was demolished, because of inability to furnish dockage space.

In the past a considerable quantity of lumber has also been shipped to Washington by boat. Existing facilities are not adequate to provide for such business. Some of this lumber came from the Pacific coast and some from other points. Among concerns desiring dockage which could not be furnished are:

The Hammond Lumber Co., Chicago, Ill.
The Long Bell Lumber Co., Longview, Wash.
St. Andrews Bay Lumber Co., Sherman, Fla.
Krauss Bros. Lumber Co., Seattle, Wash.
Robert N. Sizer & Co., New York City.
Captain O. Sutherland, Baltimore, Md.
Rosslyn Steel & Cement Co., Rosslyn, Va.

It has been stated upon what appears to be good authority that there is ordinarily used in Washington about 50,000,000 feet of lumber per year from the Pacific coast now brought to Baltimore by boat and reshipped to Washington by rail. It is stated upon the same authority that a saving in transportation and handling cost of about $4 per 1,000 feet would result if there were sufficient docking space at Washington wharves for boats bringing this lumber from the western coast.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] in the course of the debate on the independent offices bill viewed with justified alarm the effect of the Cuban Tariff Trade Treaty on the Maine potato grower. The result of this trade treaty with Cuba, made in the name of the President by the Secretary of State, sitting in close communion with the representatives of Cuba, seriously affects every potato grower in America. I have asked for time today to discuss another phase of this treaty-making power which threatens to destroy a great American industry.

THE MATCH INDUSTRY

I wish to give the House a birdseye view of this branch of national production. The match industry of America gives steady employment to more than 35,000 wage earners actually engaged in the manufacture of matches. It consumed, in the year 1933, American lumber and other products amounting in value to $10,433,000. It is safe to say that from the industry itself, and the various activities which produce its raw materials, more than 100,000 Americans obtain their livelihood. This industry, which is highly competitive, has had hard sledding in recent years. The American manufacturer has had to compete with the low-priced labor of the Scandinavian countries, Japan, and the forced labor of Soviet Russia.

FINDINGS OF TARIFF COMMISSION

It is interesting to note that on April 5, 1934, the Tariff Commission, under the provisions of section 3E of the National Industrial Recovery Act, made a report to the President with respect to matches. It found, among other things, that matches are imported almost entirely from the countries above named and that they are sold at prices below the cost of production in the United States. The Tariff Commission also found that the domestic cost of production has been increased materially as a result of the operations of the N. R. A. It further found that the import of matches seriously endangers the operation of the domestic industry under the code. The Commission then made certain recommendations to the President, which were enacted into law in the last session. The match industry, as a result of this legislation, seemed to be entering on happier times. But its security was not for long. Its situation is now definitely threatened by the tariff treaty-making power which Congress in an evil hour delegated to the administration.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Is the gentleman going to put into the RECORD the cost of production in Japan?

Mr. CULKIN. I do not have those figures, except as to the daily wage paid in that country.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman know that the wage scale in Japan is approximately 20 cents a day?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes. It is under 20 cents.

Mr. FISH. And that they can feed themselves at 5 or 6 cents a day?

Mr. CULKIN. I will say to the gentleman that the male laborer in Japan works 12 hours a day and gets approximately 17 cents. The female operative gets approximately 9 cents a day and works 12 hours.

Mr. FISH. I believe the gentleman is correct. I wish the gentleman would emphasize that, because this is an entirely new factor that has developed in the last year only.

Mr. CULKIN. I will say to the gentleman from New York that, by reason of the low cost of production, Japan has already preempted several industrial fields. A notable example of this is the textile industry. I was told recently that the Japanese have driven English textiles out of India; that they have driven American, German, and English textiles out of the South American market. I am creditably informed that they not only produce a garment identical in weave and texture to the competing product but they forge the labels of recognized American brands and counterfeit the boxes which carry their trade mark. Japan is able to sell this product at 25 percent less than the cost of American production. This, by reason of the fact that wages paid in Japan are as I have stated. We will need a strong national policy to meet this situation. With a free trader at the helm in the State Department, I am naturally pessimistic about getting results.

A meeting was recently held at the country estate of Samuel Untermeyer, a multimillionaire lawyer, who is attorney for the International Match Corporation. Fifteen empire builders came from England, Sweden, and other European countries to attend the conference. The purpose of the conference was to write a match tariff for the United States. Norman H. Davis, who is the ambassador at large for the present administration, was represented at the meeting by an international firm of public accountants. Mr. Davis looms large in the international activities of the present administration. He appeared at this meeting as general chairman of a committee in charge of the three Kreuger companies. I do not wish to impugn the integrity of Mr. Davis. I do question the propriety of his participating, even by proxy, in this type of meeting where an attempt is being made to undermine and destroy an essential American industry. The procedure in this case is open to the same objection made by the gentleman from Maine to the treaty with Cuba. Obviously, until the deed is accomplished and the treaty made, the public will know little about it.

THE SWEDISH MATCH TRUST

The Swedish Match Trust, through the diplomatic officers of Sweden, now asks our Government to cut the match tariff in half and for an import quota on safety matches of five millions gross, or over 60 percent of the American consumption of that type of matches. These interests are backed by certain international bankers who have rooked the American investor to the tune of $200,000,000 in the sale of worthless Kreuger securities. These apostles of high finance are now seeking to destroy the match industry of America. The House knows that the Swedish Match Trust was brought into being by the manipulations of Ivar Kreuger, greatest industrial swindler of this or any other generation. This man left a trail of corruption around the world. The Swedish Match Trust was his evil creation and over two hundred millions of American savings were lost in this enterprise. Kreuger is said to be dead but his lobbying tactics are kept alive through the trust which he organized. The only Americans who ever made any money out of Kreuger were certain banking groups, lobbyists, and such like. These same groups now have the temerity to attempt to recreate for the benefit of the Swedish bankers the match monopoly once enjoyed by the swindler Kreuger.

SECRETARY HULL AN AVOWED FREE TRADER

Under the Trade Treaty Act of last spring, Congress gave blanket and plenary powers to the President to negotiate these treaties. The President of necessity delegates the negotiation of these treaties to the distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull. I have the greatest respect for Mr. Cordell Hull. I have the highest regard for his character and for his idealism, but he is a free trader, unashamed and unafraid. In times of national stress we need realists in the public service, not men who are pursuing ideals. Those of us who sat in the House with him recall his repeated statements that all tariffs were destructive of national good. It may now be told that Professor Moley's retirement from the office of Assistant Secretary of State was due to the fact that the editor of Today was and is a vigorous nationalist. He battled bravely with his erstwhile chief for the continuance of American standards of living. By a strange turn in the wheel of fate Cordell Hull is now in the driver's seat on tariff matters. With his tariff viewpoint he is more dangerous to American labor, agriculture, and industry than a wilderness of "brain trusters." But Congress at one fell swoop delegated to him the power to make tariffs.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. Does the gentleman think that this Congress has any right or authority under the Constitution to delegate its powers?

Mr. CULKIN. I am coming to that later. I am very firmly of the opinion that the recent decision in the oil case settles that question, that Congress had no such power, but I will discuss it more fully later.

We may assume that he will be true to his mistaken idealism and whenever possible the distinguished Secretary of State will wipe out tariff barriers. This procedure, in my opinion, will largely destroy American industry and American labor. Unemployment in America already menaces our very existence. Under this type of tariff making it will increase it by leaps and bounds. There is but one solution to this situation in which we find ourselves. The Congress should repeal the tariff-making power delegated to the President and resume its constitutional duty in the tariff-making field. [Applause]. Pending this the responsible Democratic leadership of the Nation should scrutinize these tariff treaties carefully, and by appeal to the President save American industry and agriculture from being destroyed by an influx of foreign products. It is obvious that the match maker of America drawing $3 or $4 a day for 7 hours cannot compete with the forced labor of Soviet Russia or that of Japan and Sweden where wages are nominal and the daily grind without limit. This same proposition applies to every phase of American production, whether industrial or agricultural.

It is my judgment that the Supreme Court, following its reasoning in the oil case, will, if given an opportunity, declare this nefarious act a nullity. American industry, labor, and agriculture are in grave danger and the issue should be promptly adjudicated by the high court.

May I say, in conclusion, that in this and every other surrender of its constitutional power to the Executive, Congress has abased itself and laid the foundations of a fascism, where there will be neither personal liberty nor representative government. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if there were only more new Members in the Chamber at this time, I should like to disabuse their minds of some of the things that were stated here a little while ago by the distinguished gentleman and philosopher from the sagebrush country of Texas. I shall never forget as a Member of the Seventy-third Congress, listening with deep interest to the statement that was made at that time about how we frittered away the money of the people of this country and lavished it upon the people of the District of Columbia, despite the fact that they have here an automobile license fee of $1, that they have a so-called "municipal" tax rate of only $1.50 per hundred, that they get free garbage disposal and garbage collection, that trees are planted and parks provided where they may bask in the shade or gambol on the greensward, all at the expense of the Federal Government. I listened with a degree of rapture when I heard that first statement 2 years ago, and I assumed that most of the people who are permanent residents in the District of Columbia had horns, or should have had horns, on the basis of that recital.

At that time I was assigned as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. It did not do any particular good out in my district. I could not make any votes by doing something for the people here, but yet, like good soldiers, we are supposed to take on these tasks that are assigned to us by virtue of our Membership in this House, even though we may not like them.

After a while I found that the conditions that obtained here were not nearly so bad as they were painted by the distinguished gentleman from Texas. I assumed at that time that my constituency in Illinois would want me to do precisely the same thing for the people in the District of Columbia that they would want me to do for those folks out there. So all during the Seventy-third Congress I followed that theory, and I think we got pretty fair results.

I shall not undertake to disabuse the minds of new Members at this time as to what does or does not obtain with respect to the benefits derived by the people of this District from Uncle Sam, except to say that when you look at the amount appropriated, be it $37,000,000, $38,000,000, or $39,000,000, remember that after all Congress is only reappropriating the District's own money. Last year something like $5,700,000 was contributed by the Federal Government as a lump sum toward the expenses of the District of Columbia, but most of the money in this appropriation bill comes from the pockets of the taxpayers in the District. The lump sum of $5,700,000 supposedly represents displacement of prospective revenues by Government property in the District, and if we live until doomsday there will be no unanimity of opinion as to whether that sum is too much or too little.

Remember, also, that the residents of the District do not have a vote; and let me make it clear right here and now, parenthetically, that I am not in favor of extending the right of franchise to the people of the District because of the great transient population here and of the difficulties that might arise from their enfranchisement. I still say that if by virtue of the fact they have no vote but have to look to this body for government, and generally have to take such crumbs as too often come to the stepchild, you will find as you go along that it is not a one-sided picture. There will be opportunity for me to address myself to this question, however, at greater length at some later time. Right now I wish to follow and continue the thread of the argument delineated on a moment ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] with respect to reciprocal trade.

I suppose if somebody with a mathematical turn of mind were to put a ruler on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Seventy-third Congress he probably would find that more space and more words had been devoted to the subject of agriculture than to any other subject that has been discussed upon this floor. Now, I do not happen to be a dirt farmer, nor do I happen to be an industrialist. I am not so sure but what freedom from both prejudices makes it possible for one to get a rather dispassionate view of this reciprocal trade agreement plan that was fastened upon the country by the Seventy-third Congress. In response to the question of constitutionality raised by the gentleman from Missouri a little while ago, my own humble opinion is that, after all, it may be entirely constitutional. It departs somewhat from the facts in the oil controversy upon which the Supreme Court passed a week or two ago in that their decision concerned itself largely with the fact that there was no rule of conduct or guidance laid down by which the President was circumscribed in controlling the oil industry. When we study the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act, however, we find that Congress did set down some rule of conduct. First of all, the President may not transfer goods from the free list to the dutiable list and vice versa; and limitations were further imposed upon the President in that he could not alter existing rates by more than 50 percent. At least, there was a rule of conduct. At least, there are these limits so that it is not strictly on all fours with the hot-oil decision and it may be held constitutional.

But getting back to reciprocal trade agreements, I say I am not a farmer and I am not an industrialist. I do not like to venture too far from shore on matters of agriculture. I believe that once before I told the story of the gentleman who was holding forth at great length on agriculture, telling that he was a dirt farmer and could do anything that was done on a farm respecting all these various operations. When he got through a small boy in the back of the room asked him:

"Mister, did you say you could do everything that was done on a farm?"

He said, "Yes, sir."

"Well", said the boy, "mister, did you ever lay an egg?"

And so with that kind of repartee, coming from somebody who knows something about agriculture as a dirt farmer, I do not want to venture too far from shore on the farm problem. However, back in the days of Pharaoh there was a farm problem. You will recall the story of the 7 years in which there was an abundance in Egypt and then the 7 lean years; and you will recall the dream of Pharaoh as related by the Scriptural story, a dream in which he saw 7 well-fleshed kine come up out of the river to be swallowed by 7 ill-fleshed kine; how the 7 poor ears of corn devoured the 7 good ears. There came a period of plenty in Egypt which endured for 7 years, followed by 7 years of famine, and, finally, Pharaoh set Joseph over the kingdom and allowed him to appoint a great personnel and conduct a kind of warehousing and distribution system. Joseph did not undertake to solve the farm problem in Egypt by exporting a lot of fancy pyramids, camel's hair shawls, camels, and such things; he solved it by treating it as an internal-warehousing and distribution problem.

So they had the farm problem thousands of years ago, and the world has had the farm problem ever since. Those Members who were here last session will remember that a great deal of time was devoted to the subject of agricultural emergency. I voted for every one of those agricultural emergency bills; and if they were again to come into this Chamber under similar conditions I would do precisely the same thing all over, because I thought then and still think that there was justification for an emergency program. But a distinction must be made between an emergency program and a program that is supposed to be lasting and durable. At the time the distinguished Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, sent his emergency program to this body, after laying out this system of processing taxes and cash benefits on tobacco, cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, and other commodities, he announced informally in his pamphlet, America Must Choose, that we had only one of two alternatives, either continued regimentation in this country or expanded foreign outlets, with the qualification that there is a middle ground.

It seems to me that this was a rather unsound premise I could not follow, because I do not believe it necessarily follows if we do not have outlets in foreign countries that we still have to regiment all the divers farmers in the United States of America and curtail acreage as a permanent policy, and to that subject I want to address my attention for just a little while.

It is a rather singular thing that, insofar as our own country is concerned, and its problems of surpluses, it goes back to the Civil War, and too often we underestimate some of these historical forces that have been operating to create problems of the present day. An examination of these forces may elucidate some aspects of the problems that concern us at the present time. You will recall from your reading of American history that, after the Civil War was over, we had dissipated a slave empire, embracing 4,000,000 slaves and 350,000 landowners of the South. Those slaves became competitors in a free labor market. Lots of them came up into the State of Illinois and other Northern States, and there they received the same rate of pay that any other labor received for similar work. This competition became operative immediately after the Civil War, and tended to raise wages.

Moreover when this great reservoir of slave labor had been ended in the South there was a great impetus to the invention of labor-saving devices in order to till and cultivate the same amount of land and at the same time keep down the agricultural overhead. That was historical item no. 1 that made a great contribution to the agricultural problem of today, because it raised wages, stimulated invention, promoted expansion, made agriculture a business.

The second historical fact was the closing of the frontier. This country had a Secretary of the Treasury in 1827 who with a great flourish stated that we had enough arable domain to last us for 500 years, and yet just 70 years after the gentleman made this statement all the good, arable land in this country had been preempted or taken over; so he missed his guess by approximately 430 years.

What happens when the frontier closes on itself? What happens when people shift from the eastern seaboard over to the other side of the Alleghenies, then to the Mississippi Valley, and finally get out to the Pacific coast and find that the frontier has disappeared? The forces of population begin to close on themselves and, like some centripetal force, develop a fixed and stable civilization. Your frontier is gone. It is no longer possible for a man who exhausts a tract of land in one locality to move elsewhere without paying for the domain. The net result is that land values go up and agriculture becomes a settled thing, to be developed and expanded. First the dissipation of the great slave empire, and secondly the closing of the frontier, and third the machine-invention age that we had right after the Civil War were all factors in this development. There was the Oliver chilled-steel plow, the binder, the reaper, and then in gradual succession, the potato digger, the corn binder, the threshing machine, the grain thresher, and all of those implements for greater production and lower costs. This made a business man and capitalist out of the farmer, and he had to march down the road shoulder to shoulder with the banker. Everyone knows that you cannot stock a farm with livestock and proper equipment unless you have money. The result was when land values went up and when it became necessary because of the invention of machinery for the farmer to march down the road together with the banker, by the same token he had to become mindful of the agricultural forces that were operative in other parts of the world.

It was not any longer a case of scratching the soil and bartering his corn, cotton, or tobacco to the gentleman who ran a store at the crossroads and receive in return some shoes, clothing, and other store goods. Those days were over. He became a business man, interested in every factor that might affect the price of products which he produced. He was concerned about the things that were taking place in other countries. This means, translated into terms of every-day conduct, that if they had a premature frost in the Argentine tomorrow morning, it might affect their wheat crop, we would know it in Washington within 6 hours. You will then see the grain market getting bullish or bearish, depending on the effect. If they have a premature frost in Russia, we would know it on the board of trade in Peoria just as fast as the wires can get it to us. You would see prices go either up or down. So we do live in a kind of a well-integrated world. That can be proved every day and every day.

So you have the traditional forces of machine production on the farm, the closing of the frontier, the raising of agricultural prices, then the dissipation of the slave-labor empire in the South, and finally geographic specialization of agriculture.

When Andrew Jackson was President of this country, six of the leading corn-producing States were below the Mason-Dixon line. Where are they now? They are all out in the Central West—Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Nebraska. Along about 1850 the center of wheat production was at Columbus, Ohio. You can drive there today from Washington in about 12 or 14 hours with your automobile. Where is it now? It is on the other side of Kansas City.

What is the reason for the shifting of these production centers? It is due to specialization. They raise cotton in the South; they raise tobacco in the South; they raise hogs and corn out in my country; they raise wheat in Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, and the Northwest. So we have become a very specialized kind of country so far as agriculture is concerned.

There you have the basic forces that were operative two generations ago and that were tending to build up a surplus sooner or later—this very surplus that haunted us 2 years ago and made experts cudgel their brains for a solution.

Now may I point out a singularity in connection with this agricultural development. In 1895 we produced about 2,500,000,000 bushels of corn in this country. Our population at that time was 70,000,000 people. In 1931, with 122,000,000 population, we produced 2,750,000,000 bushels of corn. This was a 9-percent increase in the production of corn, whereas our population almost doubled in the same period. Does that not induce a most acute question as to why the production of corn, for instance, did not keep pace with population? It might be well to carefully examine the changes and forces that were operative during that period and see whether they furnish a clue to the cause and whether our attempts to find relief for agriculture through reciprocal-trade treaties go to the heart of the farm problem.

I think the very first clue, as we search for specific reasons, is the decrease in the domestic consumption of meat, as well as in the export of meat.

For those not identified with the Central West, it is too difficult to believe, and yet 85 percent of all the corn crop that is grown out in the 11 major corn-producing States is marketed on the hoof or in the form of meat. They throw that corn into hogs and into beef, and then it is marketed in the form of meat and livestock. This is the way they get rid of it. So there is about 15 percent of the crop available for odds and ends on the farm and for industrial purposes.

Now, in proportion, as the export of meat is curtailed, so you curtail the outlet for grain. If you curtail, voluntarily or involuntarily, the domestic consumption of meat by new-fangled diets or other food fads, or by substitutes, the number of animals needed to supply the people of this country with meat decreases and then, a priori, your outlet for grain decreases.

From 1921 to 1928, our average annual exports of beef and pork were about 439,000,000 pounds. Two years ago, when we were on the decline, it was only 270,000,000 pounds. This is a differential of about 140,000,000 pounds, and what does it mean? It means that much of the outlet for corn and wheat and that sort of thing has been taken away. Now, if you go on with your static production of grain and you take away all these animals that furnish an outlet, what happens? You just pour that into the surplus. There is no magic or mystery about that. You do not have to be a Houdini or a Chinaman or anything of that sort to understand that if you take away 140,000,000 pounds of meat in the domestic and export market, you just curtail the market for grain to that extent and then it goes into the surplus. This is item no. 1.

Item no. 2 concerns itself with the decrease in the number of horses and mules in this country. We read these facts about decreasing farm animals rather casually, and we pay very little attention to their economic implications, and yet the effects on agriculture are very readily discernible when you stop to think about it.

In 1915 we had 29,000,000 horses and mules in this country. How many have we today, according to the Department of Agriculture? About 18,000,000. There has been a decrease of 11,000,000. Why? Oh, that does not necessarily have to be answered. You can answer it for yourself, because everybody knows the answer. It is the displacement of farm animals by the truck, the tractor, and the motor car. Remember the days when the farmers in your country—and I believe my good friend, Governor PIERCE, can recite this out of his own personal experience—used to drive to town, whether it was 8 or 10 or 12 miles, in one of these old Democrat buggies with a fringe around the top and a beribboned whip in the whip socket and a spirited team of horses clamping at the bit. You do not see them any more. How do they go to town now? In Dodges, Buicks, Fords, and Chevrolets. This is one of the reasons why we do not have as many horses and mules by 11,000,000 as we had just a half generation ago. The use of trucks instead of big, strapping draft animals and the use of tractors ahead of the plough are the other reasons.

Now, the implication of the displacement of horses and mules by trucks, tractors, and motor cars is just this: Take away 11,000,000, multiply that by four, because it takes about 4 acres to subsist a good, healthy Missouri mule or a good work horse from one end of the year to the other, and that makes 44,000,000 acres that have been displaced by the automobile, the tractor, and the truck. There has not been any compensation whatever along the line for this loss in behalf of the farmer. The farmer has accepted it stoically as a rather progressive condition, just the result of a movement forward in this as in other sections of the world. The fact remains, however, that we have displaced 44,000,000 acres when we have taken 11,000,000 horses and mules and displaced them with some kind of mechanical power. What happens to the grain and the agricultural commodities raised on this 44,000,000 acres? If there is no outlet, it goes into the surplus, and I am sure even Mr. Wallace is quite in accord with this appraisal of one of the basic factors contributing to a surplus.

So there you have item no. 2—displacement of horses and mules with machinery and tractive power.

Now, item no. 3 concerns itself with the displacement of our own farm products by competitive products that are imported from other countries, and let me enumerate some of those that are imported.

One of the reasons I was so earnestly opposed to this Cuban reciprocal agreement was that there was a possibility of reducing the existing duty by 50 percent upon blackstrap molasses. Goodness knows, the duty on it now does not amount to a tinker's whoop, and yet they have authority to reduce it by 50 percent.

Now let me show you the economic and the agricultural implication of the importation of hundreds of millions of gallons of this blackstrap molasses that comes from Cuba. In fact, blackstrap comes not only from Cuba, but it comes from every sugar-producing, offshore island, probably, within 1,000 or 2,000 miles of this country. You call up the Department of Internal Revenue and ask them how much alcohol was manufactured in this country in 1932 for the fiscal year, and the chances are they will tell you that 142,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol was produced. How much of that was made of molasses and how much was made from grain? They will tell you that 85 percent of all the industrial alcohol produced in the fiscal year 1932 was made from blackstrap molasses imported from these islands. How much from grain? Oh, about 3½ or 4 percent. Think of it! On the one hand, through the instrumentality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, they go to the farmers in my district and say to them, "You reduce your corn production by 20 percent, you reduce the production of hogs by 25 percent, and teach birth control to the rest of them, so that we may get this hog and corn production down to some kind of level where it can be absorbed in this country", and then in the next breath, we let all this competitive sirup come from Cuba and Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, directly in competition with the corn that is grown out in our States. Now, does this make good, consistent sense? On the one hand we say to the farmers, "Reduce", and on the other, through a reciprocal agreement, we say, "Send in all this stuff you want, even though it is in direct competition with corn and other commodities grown in the Central West."

What difference does that make? Send it in. They did this, and you see what has been done. By letting these competitive products come into this country we have seriously impaired the industrial market for the farmer so far as corn is concerned, and this industrial market was the only certain market that still remained for him.

Perhaps I am a bit obtuse, and yet I have never heard a single satisfactory explanation of a program which pays cash benefits to farmers to permit acreage to stand idle and in the same breath declares: "We are sorry, but we will have to take 85 percent of that 142,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol which might well be made of corn and give it to Cuba and take it away from you."

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman tell us the rest of the reciprocal trade on lard and other products? Do not confine yourself to one article. I am much interested in the gentleman's remarks. I am a real farmer, living on my farm, and I know this thing from beginning to end. What is the remedy, will the gentleman tell us?

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Briefly.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is it not true that one of the largest distilleries in the country is located in the gentleman's district?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is quite true, but they do not produce industrial alcohol. The seaboard and New Orleans get that. The distilleries in my district make drinking alcohol—not the kind that you pour into radiators or rub on your ankle. I am considering the taking away of the farmer's market. The gentleman may also be interested to know that for a time an effort was being made to convert molasses into potable alcohol for mixture with liquor.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Why is it that they produce the bulk of this alcohol on the seaboard?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, transportation enters into it. For another thing, the duty on molasses is negligible; moreover, the cost of the molasses is very low, and, finally, in the process of making alcohol it takes about 8 hours to convert molasses as against 30 hours for grain. Hence the overhead is much lower.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can the gentleman tell us the cost of shipping a bushel of grain from Des Moines, Iowa, to Peoria, compared with the shipping of a gallon of alcohol from the Philippine Islands to New York?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am sorry, but I have not that information. I shall be glad to try to get it and put it into the RECORD, if it can be obtained. I should like to know, myself. The matter has never been presented to me before.

Going along with a few more of these competitive items, take tapioca starch. On the 29th of January they will close the hearings before the reciprocal-trade group or the reciprocity-information committee on negotiations with the Netherland Empire, preparatory to entering into a trade agreement with the Netherlands. Now, when you talk to the Netherland Empire, remember that it includes not only that little chunk of country in Europe but Netherland Guiana, and Netherland Indies, and Netherland West Indies as well. Down in those Dutch islands they produce what is known as "cassava" and "arrow root", and "sago starch", and "tapioca starch." They can produce twice as much per acre as we can of starch from corn in our country. Labor, as has been testified here before, commands about 20 cents a day. Land is worth $5 an acre. Yield is high, production prolific, costs low. The result is they export that starch to this country for the purpose of making glue and adhesives, in the production of yeast, and for use in confectioneries and textile mills. They send it over in great quantities, duty free. Back in 1908 it was not a problem. Only 20,000,000 pounds of such tapioca starch came in; but in 1933, which, by the way, was a depression year, when one would think that the importation would fall off sharply, it increased steadily, so that in that year we imported 192,000,000 pounds of tapioca starch, every pound of it in direct competition with these great lush, abundant fields of corn that wave their pennons in the breeze out in Illinois and Iowa and the western country in the spring and in the summer. One hundred and ninety-two million pounds! Just convert it into terms of 28 pounds of starch per bushel and use your own arithmetic, in figuring out how many million bushels of corn are thereby displaced. It comes in duty free. There is no duty on it, and the reason why I cordially disapprove of any proposed reciprocal trade agreement affecting such starch is that the authority to make such treaties was extended to the President for 3 years, and once those treaties are imposed, you know very well that they will not be revised before that time. The Corn Belt will therefore be foreclosed for 3 years in its hope for some relief. They are sending great quantities of that tapioca starch into this country from the other side of the earth, in direct competition with the very corn farmer whom we have asked to reduce his acreage by 20 percent. Is that reason, is that logic? Is there consistency in that kind of a program?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly.

Mr. DITTER. Is the gentleman familiar with the competitive conditions in connection with the proposed Netherland agreement insofar as the cement industry is concerned?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They have not progressed to that state as yet, but I shall touch upon that directly. Here, then, you have these specific causes for our surplus—decrease in the domestic consumption of meat; decrease in the export of our meat, taking away the outlet for the farmers' corn; the decrease in horses and mules, displaced by automobile tractor power, taking away a great portion of his market; and, third, the importation of these competitive products like blackstrap, tapioca starch, in direct competition with corn. Finally, there was a substantial expansion of acreage during the World War. Is there, then, any mystery about this surplus? It was an inevitable development; and when it became so acute in 1932 and 1933 as to send prices for farm products to ruinous levels, we had to resort to artificial remedies to keep the farmer going.

Now, getting back to Mr. Wallace, he assumed the premise in that little book called "America Must Choose" that either we had to find an outlet in foreign countries or we had to regiment. He did not say that there might be something else, although he did speak about a middle ground. For myself, however, I still cherish the notion that we do not have to find a foreign outlet. We can follow an intense kind of nationalism for our own welfare and for the protection of the standard of living of labor in this country, and still do not have to regiment either. Under these reciprocal-trade agreements, as pointed out, what are the possibilities? They can enter into a trade treaty with any country and can reduce existing duty by as much as 50 percent, with a limitation, of course, that nothing is to be transferred from the free list to the dutiable list or vice versa.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. As a matter of fact, cannot the President also under the flexible clause of the 1930 Tariff Act first reduce the tariff on a product by 50 percent, and then, under the legislation that the gentleman is speaking of, again reduce that tariff 50 percent?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I presume the gentleman is right.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman is right, because the President has already done that in regard to sugar.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct. What are the possibilities for an outlet of agricultural products in foreign trade? If you want to read something rather illuminating, look at the recent experience of Etienne Flandin, the new Premier of France, the young man who is trying to make over that country. Last year—that is, 1933—they had a wheat crop of 362,000,000 bushels in France, the largest since 1907. The year before the wheat crop was 334,000,000 bushels, and the year before that about 340,000,000 bushels. They had probably thirty or forty million bushels of surplus wheat per year during the last 3 or 4 years. In fact, their surplus began in 1929. Think of all the artificial devices, such as subsidies, controls, and that sort of thing, they resorted to in order to correct the problem, and yet it is just as aggravated now as it ever was. France was never a wheat-exporting nation, but she is rapidly becoming so, especially when she produces an exportable surplus for 5 successive years. So what hope have we of sending them any of our flour or wheat under such conditions? What hope have we of sending bacon and hams and lard to Denmark, when her hog production has increased 500 percent since the war? Mr. Wallace said that we lost 8 percent of our English market for bacon and ham just a few years back. There is no mystery about that. It does not cost nearly as much to ship from Denmark to England as from America to England, and because of their increase in pork production they have taken away our market, and we shall not get it back unless we are willing to enter into price competition in the world market.

Germany, too, has subsidized the production of heavy hogs, so that her production of pork products has more than doubled since the war. What hope is there of sending our agricultural surpluses to her when she is making a determined effort to become self-contained?

When we enter a world price-competition market, we begin to sadly impair the living standards in this country. The man who sells cheapest in the world market gets the business, and to meet world prices we must junk the N. R. A., reduce costs, and lower the standard of living. Is there anyone who cares to follow such a course?

Now, what is the outlet in Italy for agircultural commodities? Up to 2 years ago they bought, on an average, about 51,000,000 bushels of wheat every year. Did they buy it last year or the year before? Indeed not. Mussolini has been draining the swamps along the Tiber River. He has been expanding the agricultural acreage of his country, so that Italy is going to become an exporter, as a matter of fact, having enough for her own needs, and an exportable surplus. What is the situation in Canada?

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Does not the gentleman believe that the tariffs that those countries have had, have had more to do with that than the reasons which the gentleman has given?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I doubt it very much. I was so glad to see in the newspaper the other day a statement by a well-known Englishman, who was feeling so happy over the fact that now Britain was lodged behind a high tariff wall and could take care of her people, while over in this country we try to break it down and open up the greatest market in this country to a lot of foreign competition.

Now, I want to come to that directly. But here is Russia increasing her wheat in a single year from about 780,000,000 bushels to 1,200,000,000; Canada increasing by leaps and bounds. So gradually the whole world has in a way been shut off, because the world is becoming agricultural minded, and they do not need our commodities.

Now, do not misunderstand. There are some outlets in Cuba for bacon and lard. There are some outlets in France for some of our lard, bacon, and ham if we will take some of their wine, which is in competition with the wine growers of California. There is some chance of exporting some of our commodities to Spain if we will accept her products in competition with some of our own industries. Do not misunderstand. There is still some outlet, but the premise I want to follow is that we are going to come out on the short end of this deal because we are not the shrewd traders that they are. Finally we will open up our great American markets to all comers, for the sake of insubstantial benefits and say, "Come and get it."

So when you survey the agricultural development in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Spain, and Germany where they subsidize the production of heavy hogs, in Russia and in the Argentine, you can see what we are facing. We have even bought beef for the C. C. C. camps from the Argentine. We had to go down there and buy several million pounds because the Secretary of War said that we did not produce the right kind of beef for those boys. We had to bring that in, in competition with our own farmers, and at the same time we watched their great struggle to keep alive and try to preserve some market for their own products, ultimately having to be subsidized by the Federal Government.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. The matter of Argentine beef for the C. C. C. camps is not now being used in those camps.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; it is not. But the gentleman will remember that the Secretary did buy several million pounds of that beef.

Mr. PIERCE. Oh, yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. And there was a lot of noise made in the well of this House about it.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman is aware, of course, that there are constant importations of canned and other beef brought into this country from both the Argentine and Brazil?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, without doubt.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Constantly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The records of the Department of Commerce will indicate the importation of all those products, even though we have a surplus of those products in our own country at the present time.

So as you survey the world's trade structure there is little cause to believe that there is a great outlet for our surplus products, but somebody believes there is and from that belief prepares to give something in return—a something far more valuable than anything which other nations have to offer. We cannot expect them to take our ham and our bacon and some of these other things that we produce without taking something from them also.

You know what the old historical theory is of this exchange of products. It goes back to the time of Adam Smith, the old English economist, in his Wealth of Nations, and his theory of a division of production. Let America, if it has more efficiency in one line, produce it and send it to Europe, and, if they over there have particular efficiency in some other line, let them send us their products in which they are more efficient. I say to you now that I would fully subscribe to that old theory of the division of labor, even on an international basis, in the days of the handicraft guilds, but not today. There has been a development of the mass-production principle, which was carried to all corners of the earth. It is the thing that has dumped the free traders over. In the day of Adam Smith, in England, who was one of the first free traders, there was perhaps some justification for producing things here and sending them over there and accepting their things in return, but that does not obtain today, because when you go to Germany, for instance, they will find this thing that they interpret as "Fordism", the principle of mass production and standardization of industry, by Henry Ford, as well exemplified there as it is in this country. Go to Japan and what will they talk about? They are talking about the principle of "Fordism." We did not have it a generation ago when there was a kind of leisure in this country, but today they are all trying to industrialize on this theory of mass and quantity production. It is a kind of virus that not only goes into industry but it goes into every integral element of our national life.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman know that at the present time they are discussing a reciprocal trade agreement with Holland on cement?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, yes; and with Belgium and some of the other countries.

Mr. SHORT. And with Switzerland on the chemical industry.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; and on watches and clocks and electric meters and other products.

Mr. SHORT. And with Mexico and other countries as pertains to the production of lead and zinc?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Right.

Mr. SHORT. Two-thirds of the United States production is in my district in southwest Missouri.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right; but it is the old division of labor by the free traders. Therefore, to carry out this reciprocal trade doctrine, we buy from them and they buy from us. Then comes along the high-power, high-speed machine, and this idea of mass production and it just sort of dumps the Adam Smith theory overboard.

Witness somewhat of the concern of the Department of State: Within the last few months Japan's increase in the exportation of woolen piece goods to Oceania, Latin America, and elsewhere, has been 780 percent—such an increase in 1 single year. And who wants to put the embargo on them? Nobody but Great Britain; a gentleman from Lancashire, where they have the great calico mills, stood up in Parliament and said:

> Gentlemen, it will be just 10 years and these mills will shut down and the work will be transferred to Japan and the Orient, because they are going to take the business.

Fordism, mass production! Why, go to Czechoslovakia and see what they are doing with shoes. Go to New York City or go to Chicago and see these Bata shoe stores. They sell better shoes cheaper than they can be produced in this country and they are getting the business. You know why the chain stores get business: Because there is the lure of low price. You know that as well as I do. The same principle applies with respect to the world markets and we are greatly outdistanced because these other countries have adopted the principles of mass production coupled with low labor costs. I am willing to wager that you can go to any 10-cent store in the city of Washington and the chances are 99 to 1 that on whatever incandescent light globe you bought would be the statement that it was manufactured in Japan. Why? Because they can do it cheaper. They have the same machinery; and then they have something else. What is it? There is no N. R. A. in Japan. They work 55 and 60 hours a week. The employees make from 9 cents to 40 cents a day, depending on whether it is a male or female operative. Finally, there has been a depreciation of the yen. So all the advantages are on the side of Japan, including the mass-production principle; and we cannot hold a candle to them in the effort to compete in the world price market. That is the reason they are getting the business. Look at the increase in Japan's export of woolen piece goods. In the case of rayon the increase has been 322 percent, and yet there are rayon mills in Lewisburg, Pa., and other sections of the country working probably half time, because there is no business. Yet Japan does an unprecedented business. Why? Low price. We are trying to match wits with a country which has all the advantages, and then sooner or later I suppose we are going to come along and make some trade adjustments with these people, in the hope that we, like Lazarus of old, may pick up a few of the foreign-trade crumbs.

In my district is a little pottery factory which employs about 100 people. The manager of this factory said he wished I would come down to Washington and see what I could do about the importation of pottery from Japan. I asked him why. He told me the Japanese were importing into this country thousands of cases and barrels of pottery a month. He told me the Japanese could manufacture one of these great brown stone beer pitchers and six steins to sell at retail at a profit, at a price which was less than the cost of manufacture in this pottery factory in my district, and still pay the duty.

Now, do you think we can get anywhere in the competitive world market trying to sell against people who can produce so cheaply as all that?

What has been said about Japan applies also to Switzerland; it applies to Belgium; it applies to Holland; it applies to Germany. It applies to the principal countries of this globe; and these are the people with whom we are going to compete under reciprocal trade treaties and permit their stuff to enter our market.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. The tomato-canning industry is one of the largest in the Ozark region in the southern part of Missouri and the northern part of Arkansas. It is also a great industry in the States of New York, Indiana, Florida, Texas, and California. Unless we maintain a high protective tariff on these commodities, both on the raw and on the canned product, this great industry will be absolutely paralyzed as it was before we passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff law when we placed a duty upon both the raw and the manufactured product to protect us from imports from southern countries and from Mexico.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the gentleman from Missouri is quite correct.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I think the farmers of the United States, regardless of their political faith, want to know why it was necessary to reduce the acreage on corn 20 percent and on tobacco 40 percent when at the same time we imported $677,000,000 worth of agricultural products, which was the figure for last year.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; of all kinds, including cheese, milk, powdered and frozen eggs from China, and everything under the sun.

Mr. PIERCE. Does the gentleman want to build a wall around the country?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me get to that subject in a minute.

Mr. PIERCE. Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is pretty nearly my idea, depending on what the developments will be in the next 6 months or year. I am a rather confirmed nationalist, because I am afraid we will make it possible to impair the standard of living of American labor when we try to put them on the same basis as in foreign countries.

Mr. PIERCE. Can the gentleman picture the fate of this Nation if there is a wall built around it in connection with its world trade?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. I think that is all a lot of hooey about this world trade. I think we ought to talk a little more about internal economy. That is what we need. [Applause.]

Mr. SHORT. I agree absolutely with the gentleman. There is no use in putting out a garden unless you build a fence high enough around it to keep the neighbors' chickens out.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. Would the gentleman agree to limit the immense salaries paid to some of the corporation officials?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That does not enter into the matter. That is just one of those red herrings which is drawn across the trail to divert the argument, and has nothing to do with the matter. Whether a corporation official gets $20,000 or $100,000 a year does not affect the situation. It is one of those smoke screens that is put out in order to divert from the main argument.

May I go on with my theory? We are negotiating a treaty with Belgium and, among other things, do you know what they want to do? They want to give Belgium, for instance, 1 percent of the cement production in this country and then reduce the tariff 50 percent. They manufacture cement in Spain, they manufacture it in Holland, and they manufacture it in Great Britain. So Belgium is only one country. Under the theory and the sense of direction that the reciprocity committee now has, they may barter away 10 percent of our production—several hundred thousand barrels a year. Of course, we are going to get something in return, so we will get to that subject right now.

Mr. Chairman, foreign trade has to be evaluated in terms of labor. They send over lead pencils from Japan. The wood in a lead pencil is scarcely of any value. The graphite or the lead in a pencil has scarcely any value. It becomes valuable only when you put the hands of human beings to the wood that is in the forest and to the graphite that is in the earth and give it form, shape, and substance, producing a lead pencil, that it has any commercial value. Labor makes it valuable, and nothing else. Coal in the ground has no value whatsoever until the roughened hands of man address themselves to the job of digging it out. You could freeze to death unless human hands first brought it out so that you could put it in the stove and derive warmth.

So when you talk about foreign products, whether it is pottery, whether it is woolen goods, or whether it is rayon or lead pencils does not make any difference. It just represents so much Japanese, Czechoslovakian, or Belgian labor that is sent to this country. That is all it is.

Now, then, we are going to open up our market for them, and we are going to get some benefits in return. That is why they call it reciprocal. In other words, you scratch my back and I will scratch yours. It will be preferential. What are we doing? We are eliminating one American customer and taking foreign customer in return. May I show you how I think that will work?

Out in Illinois we have a number of watch factories. They have watch factories up in Massachusetts and elsewhere. In this contemplated treaty with Switzerland we are going to let watches, clocks, electric meters, and all that sort of thing come in under this deferential treaty and throw off 50 percent of the tariff. What happens in the watch industry that has a pay roll of $65,000,000 a year? Mind you, Switzerland has most of the world's watch business, including 50 percent of the watch business of this country. We are going to say to them, "Well, boys, some of you take your dinner buckets and go home, because we are going to let some of these watches come in from Switzerland. But they are going to buy some ham, they are going to buy some bacon, and they are going to buy some cotton goods, so we are going to buy their watches and clocks." That will mean that some of the boys in the watch industry might just as well pick up their dinner buckets and go home, because we are going to barter away a great deal of their market. By such a bargain, we have just added a few more to the long, sinister, and tragic line of unemployed in this country, and in return we have taken on one foreign customer in Switzerland. I would not kick if their standard of living compared to ours. A Chinaman can subsist on a bowl of rice and a cup of tea a day.

The same thing is true of Japan and every other country on the other side. Their standard of living is infinitely lower, and I certainly will not assent to or give my approval to any plan which seeks to do that to the American laboring man. When our laboring man has the purchasing power he will sit down to a breakfast of three or four eggs, some ham or bacon, a half loaf of bread, washing it down with a gallon of coffee, then stretch himself several times and be ready for a day's work. I am not willing to swap that kind of a customer for one who can subsist on a bowl of rice and a cup of tea every 24 hours.

Mr. RABAUT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not willing to make that kind of a swap. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RABAUT. Is it not true that under the protective system the very money that was made off the sweat of American labor was used to start a capitalistic system in the form of established factories in all European countries in direct competition to American labor and incidentally his bench was exported over there, too?

Mr. DIRKSEN. What have the moral derelictions of a few of the capitalistic to do with this argument? That is just another red herring across the trail and has not anything to do with the matter.

Mr. RABAUT. But it is the herring that affects American labor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But why condemn the whole strata of American management and industry for the sake of the moral derelictions of a few, because, after all, you cannot condemn them all any more than the bank debacle invites us to condemn every banker in the country, although there were a number of bankers who fell in that class.

Mr. RABAUT. The results that we have had to face makes very little of the gentleman's expression "just a few."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman enumerate them, outside of the so-called "international bankers" that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] likes to pick on up there? There are some, but, in proportion to the total number, not so very many; at least, they have not come to my attention and I have listened with an abiding kind of patience here day after day to the great reproaches that were hurled against the international bankers as if they were the whole kit and caboodle. It seems to me, numerically, they are a very small proportion of the total number of good, solid, honest, substantial business men who are of unimpeachable integrity. The trouble is there has been a disposition to say too little for business and too much against business. This has been one of the troubles. [Applause.]

But getting back to this division of labor, here we are going to swap a good, sod-busting, two-fisted Missourian, like those who live in DEWEY SHORT's district, for a Chinaman in the marts of world trade. We are going to trade off one of these good, two-fisted Michiganders, like those who live in ROY WOODRUFF's district, for somebody over in Czechoslovakia who will eat just enough to keep body and soul together and no more.

You have got to reduce imports to a basis of labor. This is all it is, and nothing more, and this is what we are going to throw away, and this is what we are going to take chances on when we allow all these industrial products to come in, take our own men out of industry and say that at least we get an outlet over on the other side, although we have not added to the sum total of American purchasing power one nickel's worth.

Now, one should end up where he started, and so we have to go way back into the days of Joseph and Pharaoh in Egypt. There it was a case of warehousing and distribution. It was not a case of bringing in a lot of obelisks from some other country or a lot of fancy pyramids and sending out a flock of camels. No; it was just a case of distribution, and this is the thing that Henry Wallace is talking about at the present time when he talks about the balance between industry and agriculture.

I venture to say that if we could read the Secretary's mind aright, he probably has a different notion about this reciprocal trade business than he had when he wrote that memorable little booklet, America Must Choose. You see from his public statements that he is getting more and more away from that, and I doubt whether he has a very deep and abiding faith in this thing that we call reciprocal trade, taking a chance on opening up our own market and swapping one of our own citizens and his purchasing power for purchasing power over on the other side of the ocean.

Now, while I think about it, I want to mention silver just briefly because I see my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] is in the Chamber.

You will recall that we tried to cure some of our agricultural difficulties by the first silver bill that was introduced—to accept silver at a 25-percent premium over world price in return for agricultural commodities. This, apparently, did not satisfy the silverites, as you gentlemen of the previous Congress will recall, so finally we passed the silver-purchase bill. You remember the great argument that was made here about the wonderful lot of good it would do to tamper with our monetary system in order to find a world outlet and, somehow, give great momentum and impetus to purchasing power. Well, what has happened, as a matter of fact? My good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] can tell you this himself. The visible supplies of silver in Shanghai in the last 6 months have decreased from 467,000,000 ounces to 287,000,000, and did you see what the Chinese did over here at the State Department? They have sent a note of protest to this country within the last few weeks on our silver arrangement. Why? Oh, because we are destroying the economy of China because prices are going down, because unemployment is running rampant over there, and we are harvesting just the obverse of all these beneficent results that were prophesied and anticipated right in the Well of this House when the Silver Purchase Act of 1934 was considered. So when we tamper with the monetary system, when we tamper with imports and exports and seek to tear down the wall and say, "Boys, send her over; we will absorb it even though it will put our own folks out of work", we usually do not get the benevolent results we have anticipated; at least, we have not up to this time, and I am beginning to view askance and become very skeptical about all these great experiments that we have tried, because they have not worked out.

Now, it is a case of balance, it is a case of distribution, it is a case of internal economy instead of world economy.

Let us build up the absorbing power of our own people through purchasing power instead of diminishing and impairing this power by letting more of these manufactured products come in from outside. We have not scratched the surface of potential consuming power in this country and, if instead of gallivanting to the four corners of the earth for customers and trade, we will look within the limits of our own Nation, we can bring prosperity to our own workers, find a domestic outlet for all our farm products, put idle acreage back to work and set in motion the forces that will achieve an internal balance.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman has consumed 1 hour, and under the rules his time cannot be extended except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Illinois, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Will not the gentleman use this 10 minutes in telling us what should be done with this big surplus?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say to the gentleman from Oregon I believe this country can absorb everything it can produce, if people can only be provided with some of the comforts and the luxuries which come from an adequate kind of purchasing power; but how are you going to rehabilitate this purchasing power when you let all these foreign commodities come in for the sake of a little bit of outlet for some of our own agricultural products? There is too much of a disparity in spite of all the astuteness of these gentleman on the Reciprocity Commission, and we are going to throw away too many advantages.

Now, the gentleman raises the question of cotton, and I will say that cotton presents somewhat of a problem, and it will become more aggravated in proportion as Brazil, India, the Georgian Caucasus in Russia, and all these other countries begin to expand their cotton production. Cotton will be a greater problem in years to come than it is now, and then perhaps we shall poignantly regret that we were so short-sighted as to overlook principles of internal economy that would prompt the development of other crops besides cotton in the South.

It is going to become a more aggravating problem.

Now let me point out what I have in mind. They have been experimenting with slash pine in the South, converting it into pulp. It makes an excellent kind of newsprint paper. We buy pulp at present from Sweden, from Finland, and from Canada. Millions of dollars' worth come in every year. And yet here we have a great potential field for slash-pine expansion in the South to take away more cotton acreage and diversify production in the South.

It makes for further diversification. Out in my country we have been raising corn year in and year out. At the same time there is a possibility of raising Jerusalem artichokes in that country and producing enough sugar and levulose to supply the entire sugar market without depending on other sugar countries.

The gentleman from Oregon will remember the figures that were introduced here last year showing that only 26 percent of our sugar requirements were produced in this country. We passed a law limiting the sugar produced, saying, "Thus far you shall go, and no farther."

I am not so concerned for the people living in the outlying possessions. I am concerned about my own people. [Applause.] That is what makes me a kind of nationalist. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SADOWSKI] knows it—he sees all these people unemployed, who are unable to get something to eat; hungry children going to bed supperless.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Will the gentlemen yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Is it not true that we have had in the past high tariffs and low tariffs, and that there may be something else responsible for the conditions besides the tariff?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It may be so, but you have to consider all the factors.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Does not the gentleman think that if we could devise some plan for distributing the wealth of this country among the producers we might find a solution to some of these troubles?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why worry about the distribution of wealth, unless we get to the production of wealth, because it would not take very long to distribute all the wealth in this country. You could do it in a year and exhaust it all, and if there were no constant repletion through the production and development of that wealth where would we be? We would be a Nation in bankruptcy and nothing more.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I just heard the gentleman say that there are many people going hungry in this country. Is there any reason why any people should go hungry in this country when we have an abundance of all kinds of food?

Mr. DIRKSEN. None whatsoever, and if we would practice a little more internal economy and get over our sympathy about these people living in the far corners of the world, the chances are that we would be infinitely better off. [Applause.]

After all, we are all interested in the welfare of every element of our national life—the farmer, the business man, the laboring man. Our differences spring from different ideas as how best to attain the welfare of these various elements. In the light of what has transpired in the last 2 years, in the light of industrial developments in the far corners of the earth, in the light of low living standards prevailing in other nations, I believe we best serve all interests in this country when we protect the greatest purchasing market in the world, rehabilitate purchasing power by retaining high tariffs, and protecting labor, so that American labor may once more buy the products of the American farmer and thereby achieve that happy balance that will bring prosperity to all.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I was extremely interested in the remarks of my friend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], but like a great many individuals who have not been born and reared on the farm, he is not entirely familiar with his facts and observations. We have heard a great deal of complaint about the ills that will befall the farmers of this country if we enter into reciprocal-trade agreements that have been approved, directed, and sponsored by the President of the United States. It happens to be my good fortune to know personally the two gentlemen who will negotiate for these agreements providing the same are gone into, and I refer to Mr. Wallace, the Secretary of Agriculture, and Mr. Peek, the confidential adviser to the President upon foreign trade. It so happens that Mr. Peek was chairman of a committee of 22, of which I was vice chairman, which committee in 1926 and 1927 sponsored the McNary-Haugen bill—the bill that was designed and created and framed to help the American farmer, a bill that was twice passed by this Congress by a majority of both parties, a bill that had the approval of all of the great farm organizations of this country, but was twice vetoed by President Coolidge. There were many of us who thought that this bill, known as the "McNary-Haugen bill", was a better bill than the one adopted in the Seventy-third Congress. There are many of us who still believe that the fundamental principles of that bill are preferable to those under which we are now operating. If there was in my mind ever for one moment the thought that either Mr. Wallace or Mr. Peek had in mind any reciprocal agreements or any legislation that would be detrimental instead of beneficial to the American farmer, I would have as heartily condemned such agreements or legislation as any Member of this House. Regardless of the criticism, which has been voluminous, the price of American farm commodities has steadily advanced during the past 12 months. That is the proof of the pudding, in the chewing of the string, and the thing that the American farmer is most interested in today is the selling price of the commodities which he produces. I call attention to the fact that today the selling price of hogs in the city of Cleveland, which is our principal terminal market in the State of Ohio, is $8 and $8.25 per hundred. I contrast this selling price with that of $2.50 a hundred in the spring of 1933. The price that I have named does not include the processing tax, which ranges from $2.25 to $2.75 per hundred.

So the fact is today that the American hog grower who operates under the corn-hog program is receiving around 10 cents a pound minus the transportation and commission and yardage and feed charges. A year ago a price of 10 cents per pound would have been undreamed of. Yet that is approximately the price today. Beef cattle are selling today in the Cleveland market at from $7 a hundred to $10 a hundred, and so at last after a period of 12 long years the American farmer is beginning to get back on his feet and the American farmer today knows that it was no empty promise or fulsome pledge that was made by the President of the United States in 1933 when he said that he would see to it that the forgotten man of America, the American farmer, was no longer discriminated against, but would be given his just due and that his industry would be placed on a parity with the industrial activities of the East.

Referring again to the reciprocal-trade agreement, the fact remains that you can take any 10-year period during the past 50 years and you will find that our exportations of agricultural commodities never amounted to more than 15 percent. In other words, year in and year out we consume 85 percent of the agricultural commodities that we produce and export only 15 percent. That has been the trouble in the past. The 15 percent that we export has been the tail that has wagged the dog for 12 long years, and for 12 or more long years we fought for the very principles which we have today, to complete this circle, this protective circle, if you please, by including the farmer in that circle. That circle has been completed by the legislation which this Congress has enacted, and that was not a partisan measure, but was a measure supported by a great majority of the members on both sides of the aisle, and it is a measure that today will be praised and approved and again supported by those Members who come from the great agricultural districts of the Nation, regardless to which political party they belong.

There has been considerable talk in the past about the diversification of farming in the South. Those of us who are familiar with agricultural conditions in the South know that diversification is limited, the same as diversification is limited in the State of Illinois. In that rich, black soil in certain sections of Illinois the principal crop is corn, and the principal livestock crop into which that corn is fed are hogs and beef cattle and, to some extent, dairy cattle.

The farmers there always have raised corn and they have raised hogs. As someone has said, they raise more corn to raise more hogs, and to raise more corn and more hogs ad infinitum.

So, my friends, it is idle to talk about diversification in this great Corn Belt of ours. It is idle to talk about diversification in the great southland, where cotton is the principal commodity and will continue to be for the years to come.

Talk about expansion of the production of cotton in other great cotton-producing countries is futile. For instance, Egypt is one of the principal cotton-producing countries of the world. In 1931 and 1932 Egypt tried the plan of crop regulation. Their conditions of moisture and their conditions of tillage are such that the country can absolutely control its production, yet it did not control prices. So in the past 2 years Egypt has established the policy of producing all of the cotton they can produce. That policy is now being followed by every cotton-producing country in the world.

The Bankhead Act, which was enacted by the Seventy-third Congress, has been the greatest stabilizer of the price of cotton of any legislation that has yet been proposed, and when the continuation of the policies inaugurated by the Bankhead Act was placed to a vote of the growers they voted 10 to 1 for the continuation of the provisions of that act. In my State of Ohio, where the farmers of some twenty or thirty counties voted on the wisdom of continuing the corn and hog program, created by this Congress, a majority of those farmers voted for a continuance of the plan. Until you can offer us some other alternative, until you can offer a better program or a better plan, we are bound to state that this legislation enacted for the benefit of the American farmer has been of such nature that at last the American producer of foodstuffs is beginning to rehabilitate himself; and when you rehabilitate the American farmer, you begin to rehabilitate the whole country. This rehabilitation of the American farmer will in no far distant time be reflected on the sidewalks of your great city of New York.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I should like to ask the gentleman, who is an expert on the cotton situation, if he will tell the House why it is that Brazil, which exported a year ago 10,000 tons of cotton, exported this year 100,000 tons?

Mr. TRUAX. Now, the gentleman, I assume, belongs to the class to which I referred a while ago, because the gentleman from New York, although I know he means well, is talking about the exportation of cotton in tons, when everybody knows that it is exported in terms of bales.

Mr. FISH. Not from the foreign countries. We do it by bales here. I could not translate what a metric ton is, and I thought the gentleman could do so, as he is an expert.

Mr. TRUAX. I am not an expert. Someone has defined an expert as one who knows less and less about nothing. I am simply a plain farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. The exporting troubles of this country started with the passage of the Fordney-McCumber tariff bill and later on, in a much stronger manner, by the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. In the Seventy-third Congress I introduced in the RECORD certain tables, which I shall be glad to introduce again, showing the exact effect on the American farmer, and with particular reference to the exportation of wheat, of those high-tariff bills. Immediately following the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill all European nations enacted reciprocal tariffs, running as high as $1 and $2 a bushel tariff against the importation of our wheat by those foreign countries.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. A great deal has been said with reference to our reduction in production of cotton, but is it not a fact that even though we have reduced the acreage of cotton, we still produce and have on hand more cotton than we can sell either domestically or in foreign trade at a price that will give our farmer a fair return for his cotton?

Mr. TRUAX. That is exactly right. The accumulation was there, nearly as much as 1 year's crop, between ten and twelve million bales that had accumulated because of the wholly unsatisfactory and demoralizing prices.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to get down to the real text of my remarks today. Much has been said about rehabilitation of the American people. You will never have any real and complete rehabilitation of this country until you revise, and drastically revise, your system of taxation. Many of us read today about the enactment of a 3-percent sales tax to finance the Townsend old-age-pension plan. Just recently my State of Ohio enacted a 3-percent sales tax, which it is anticipated will raise between seventy and one hundred million dollars per year. At the same time they increased the excise tax on the public utilities only 1 percent. Most of the public utilities in Ohio are owned by J. P. Morgan, a man who is said to own or control $40,000,000,000 of wealth. In other words, one individual in this great country of ours owns or controls nearly one-sixth of our wealth. Another way to put it: The total public and private indebtedness of this country—bonded, mortgaged, or otherwise—amounts to about $235,000,000,000. Our country may be worth today $250,000,000,000. In other words, 120,000,000 people, who constitute 95 percent of our population, have an equity of $15,000,000,000 in a $250,000,000,000 corporation, owned largely by a few international bankers and by other malefactors of great wealth.

A few days ago some gentlemen referred to the recent article by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson in the Saturday Evening Post.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. He failed to note or to stress one of the major recommendations of General Johnson, and that is a substantial scale-down in the indebtedness of this country. The general reports that we are trying to blow life into dead assets. In other words, we are trying to revive and we are largely paying for dead horses. This is particularly true with the agricultural industry of this great Nation of ours. It is particularly true of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of distressed home owners who are about to lose their homes. Even though they are so fortunate as to refinance their mortgage loans the rate of interest is so high, so extreme, that with their present incomes, or with no incomes at all, they simply cannot make the grade.

This Congress could well consider, Mr. Chairman, a scale-down in mortgage indebtedness contracted a dozen years ago, during the boom time. This Congress could well consider a scale-down of this indebtedness from 30 to 50 percent. Even then, on such a scale-down, those in distress, including the millions of unemployed, including the farmers who are now trying to get on their feet, would have a difficult time to make the grade. What would help this situation, Mr. Chairman, is to tax wealth; tax the wealth of this country to the limit; tax the plutocratic wealth of this country beyond the limit. In other words, until you begin to scale down the enormous, swollen fortunes, until you begin to take the fortune of J. P. Morgan and scale it down about $39,999,000,000 and leave the old pirate $1,000,000—until this is done you will not see permanent rehabilitation or recovery in this country—not as long as you permit individuals, selfish, greedy individuals, to draw incomes of $1,000,000 a year.

I know a certain man in public life in this country who would make it possible for one individual to draw an income of $10,000,000 a year. Scale them all down and limit them to $50,000 per year. [Applause.] Why, the President of the United States receives only $75,000 a year. Fifty thousand dollars ought to be enough in these days of prohibition repeal—$50,000 a year ought to be enough for any man or any woman, regardless of how aristocratic or blue-blooded he or she may be, to live on decently and comfortably. [Applause.]

We must follow the precedent established by England, with her heavy inheritance taxes. England is able to balance her budget. England is able to take care of her unemployed, without bond issues, by taxing wealth and by placing an inheritance tax that will bring back into the treasury these millions that have gone to selfish individuals.

Mr. Chairman, I hope to see the day—and I hope to see Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Sr., live long enough to see it, too—when this Congress will pass a taxation bill that will redistribute his enormous wealth, that will take $499,000,000 of the $500,000,000 he owns and place it back in the Federal Treasury. When this is done, your taxation problem will be solved. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I think there is a great deal in what the gentleman from Ohio has just said. I rather believe that those of us in this House, humble Members of Congress, could probably live on $50,000 a year. I was wondering whether it would be worth while to offer such an amendment to the next bill and see if we could not try to live within those limits by just raising our pay to $50,000 a year. I am sure that if we tried hard enough we probably could get along on that. Of course, I know, we know, we are worth more. We all know it, and maybe if we have real Democratic inflation our pay may exceed the limit set by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; the gentleman is worth more than that.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I certainly will yield for a question.

Mr. TRUAX. I suppose the gentleman's constituents think he is worth more than that.

Mr. FISH. Well, my constituents gave me several thousand more votes than I had the prior election; and I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that I come from the same district as does the President of the United States. I would further say to the gentleman that it has not been decided yet whether the President is my constituent or I am his [laughter]; but I will confess to the gentleman that at least I am not his spokesman in the House or on this occasion.

The gentleman from Ohio, who comes a long way from the cotton States, was just expressing his views as to the Bankhead bill and as to the future of the cotton growers of the South. Now, it is not my purpose to decide what is best for the cotton producers and growers of the South. I maintain, in view of the fact that they have adopted the mandatory features of the Bankhead bill and approved them by popular vote, that they ought to know what is best for their own interests.

They certainly ought to know their own business. We of the North know very little about the growing of cotton, but at least we know that in the last year, with the price of cotton going up and the Government's paying for a reduction of the cotton crops, the South has had a prosperous year. At the same time, I think it is right, not only for northerners but for every Member of the House who believes in the welfare of the United States, both in the North and South, to strike a note of warning by pointing out that the cotton producers are losing their export markets for cotton. The South is losing its world markets. I have not the figures in my head at this time, but I imagine you have lost one-third or more in the last year. If the loss was going to stop there it might not be such a serious matter, but it looks to me as if you are gradually losing every day a greater part of your export market on cotton. If you lose all your markets, of course, it will be a very serious loss to the whole country, not alone to the South. Whether it is due to the high price of cotton on account of the legislation curtailing cotton production or due to the growing of more cotton in other countries is a matter for experts to determine. The fact is that the rest of the world is growing more cotton and exporting cotton in vast quantities. Brazil is doing this, as well as India, Egypt, Russia, and other countries.

I am very much interested in what the gentleman had to say about soaking the rich. That is an old story. I was very sorry to note, as one who believes that Democrats are loyal Americans and have the interests of their country at heart and believe in our form of government, that for political purposes in the last campaign many of the more radically inclined Democrats joined with the Communists and Socialists in a campaign of soaking the rich, saying that the fortunes of the country had been accumulated in the hands of a very few people, which was endangering our economic and political systems. That is a most effective argument to the man on the street who is walking around looking for a job. There is nothing more effective. But of all the political bunk that has ever been spread around the country for election purposes, that is the worst I have heard for many years.

Everyone knows that owing to the depression the rich man has lost most of his money just as well as the poor man, and perhaps more. Some of them lost 50 percent, some 75 percent, and some have been wiped out entirely. Every Communist, every Socialist, and every pink intellectual, as well as the radicals, joined together in one main slogan, and that is that a very few very rich men control this Government and that a few rich men in Wall Street own practically all the wealth of the country. It is asserted that they control the Government, the Supreme Court, and our economic and political institutions. Outside of the fact that these wealthy men have lost half of their money, and more, owing to the depression, the truth about the matter is that they do not control, and never have controlled the Government or the Supreme Court or even our economic institutions. However, if it should ever come about that a small number of ultrarich men in the future, when we emerge to better times, should accumulate the wealth of the country in their hands and endanger our institutions, it is the easiest problem to solve and does not need a constitutional amendment.

I want every Member to note this, because this is the stock argument of every Communist and every Socialist and every radical when he wants to denounce American institutions and spread class hatred. All we have to do is to raise the inheritance tax. We raised it from 20 to 40 percent 2 years ago. If that is not high enough, it can be raised to 80 percent by a simple act of Congress if the majority of the Members of Congress, representing their people back home, believe that should be done. The rich man, like the poor man, must inevitably die and he cannot take his money to the grave with him. There are many rich men and women I know of, arrogant with wealth, who would like to take their money to the grave with them, but it cannot be done. If the time should ever come when the wealth of this country is accumulated in the hands of a very few, I shall be very glad to go along with the majority and vote for an increase in the inheritance or estate tax in order to prevent the wealth's getting into the hands of a few and endangering our institutions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman at this time favor raising the inheritance tax above 40 percent?

Mr. FISH. May I say I voted for the increase to 40 percent, and if I could find sound arguments for raising it further I might go along, but I am going to talk on a subject that is connected with that very situation, which deals with tax-exempt securities. This is a far more vital, a far more important, and a far larger issue as affecting the rich men in the country today, because I propose to show by figures that the rich men of America are escaping taxation. We have imposed a 60-percent tax on incomes in excess of $500,000. An American who has an income of $500,000 is a darn fool, to put it mildly, if he does not put all of his money into tax-exempt securities which exempt him from all income tax whereas he would otherwise have to pay an income tax of 60 percent. That is what is happening in America today. The rich man, the multimillionaire, and you cannot blame him for it because he is allowed to do so under the law, is escaping taxation and the burdens are being carried by the smaller income-tax payers. What has happened, and who is to blame?

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman made a very fine statement in reference to his views in regard to a high inheritance tax, but does the gentleman take the same view with reference to income taxes?

Mr. FISH. No. I think the income taxes are high enough, if not too high, because it takes money out of private industry. The income tax goes up to 59 percent. I think that even may be too high, although I probably voted for it. To my way of thinking the most important thing to be done in the country today is to get money back into private industry, thereby getting the wheels of industry started so that people may be employed. [Applause.] If you take the money away from the rich man or the man of moderate means through excessive income taxes you are practically seizing it and confiscating it for the Treasury of the United States and that money does not get into private industry, which is the main trouble today. I want to stress this tax-exempt-security situation, because that is far more important. I am not posing here as an expert on it, because these figures were given to me today and I have not had time to check them up or look into them, but these are the astounding figures that have been presented to me; and if accurate, show an amazing and vicious financial situation that should be remedied.

Since the 3d of August 1933, a year and a half ago, $9,000,000,000 of totally tax-exempt securities have been issued by the Federal Government, known as "Treasury notes." A Treasury note is a note that has a life not in excess of 5 years and not less than 1 year. There have been $9,000,000,000 of these Treasury notes, totally tax exempt, put out by the Democratic administration since August 3, 1933.

This money, I presume, has largely gone into the hands of the richest men and women in America and subscribed for by the big interests as well as by the big banks and corporations of the country in order to avoid taxation. These Treasury notes are totally tax exempt. Our bonds are exempt, generally, for normal taxes of 4 percent, but not exempt for surtaxes. You will notice that the Secretary of the Treasury every time he issues these Treasury notes, no matter whether the issue is for one-half billion or one billion or two billion dollars, publicly states that it shows the great credit of this Government; that it shows the confidence of the people in this administration because they have all been oversubscribed. Why, the subscribers rush to get to the head of the line in order to get some of them, and who is trying to buy them? The rich man, or the big bank or corporation, in order to escape taxation.

The multimillionaire puts his money into tax-exempt securities and does not pay a penny of income to the Government. This is what is going on, and this is why the tax-exempt Treasury notes are being grabbed up immediately, and this is the vicious circle we are up against. The man who ought to bear the burden, according to his income and his own share of the wealth which he has made out of the country, is not paying anything at all, whereas the rest of the people who have not the ready money to buy the Treasury notes and tax-exempt securities are paying according to the law, whether it be 4 or 20 or 30 percent of their income. It is the middle-class and not the very rich who are bearing the burden of taxation in America today, and the answer to it is that we ought to cease issuing any tax-exempt securities whatever. [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. TRUAX. Does not the gentleman think that if you would stop his income over a certain amount, say $50,000, and place a limitation there, he could not buy tax-exempt securities?

Mr. FISH. I understood the gentleman's argument, and I understand he stands for a capital levy.

Mr. TRUAX. That is right.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. When you talk of a capital levy, the depreciation of the dollar by act of Congress, to a large extent, was a capital levy. If it had gone out to the country as a capital levy, I think the country would have been against it. No one ever raised that issue, but it was a direct capital levy, and it took away 40 percent from the value of the dollar, automatically, by act of Congress. It not only hit the rich man, it hit the poor man as well. It hit the man who had an insurance policy, it hit the man who had savings in a bank just as well as the rich man. The man in the street thought you were hitting the rich, and he applauded. He did not realize that where you hit one rich man in this way, you hit about 1,000,000 poor men. This was a distinct capital levy, and the United States Government, to prove it, made a profit of $2,000,000,000 out of it.

There are two objections to the issuance of tax-exempt securities. First, the rich man has the money to take advantage of them and, naturally, does; and as long as we continue to issue them, he will escape taxation. The other one is that this money that the rich man has, which ought to go into private industry to keep the wheels of industry going and to provide employment, puts the money into Government tax-exempt securities, such as Treasury notes, and goes into the Treasury of the United States and is used by the Government. The result is that private industry, which generally gets most of its money from the wealthy, is not able to get any money at all. This is one of the main difficulties today and is seriously retarding business and industrial recovery.

The Government of the United States cannot continue to have deficits of four and a half billion dollars every year and act as a substitute for private industry which is unable to get money to finance itself, because the rich men are putting all their money into tax-exempt governmental securities. It is an absolutely vicious circle.

Of course, the Democratic administration claims a lot of credit because, they say, the people back home have all the confidence in the world in the administration and buy all of these issues; but it is not the American people, it is nothing but the big interests and corporations and the banks and the rich people. It is not surprising that these issues are oversubscribed two or three or four or five times. The big fellows, the big taxpayers, fight for them and line up just like people at a baseball game trying to get in first.

I introduced the following resolution, and I hope some member of the Ways and Means Committee on the Democratic side will take this resolution and reintroduce it under his own name, because I know what a swell chance I have of having any of my resolutions adopted by the Democratic majority:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the following information: The names and addresses of all persons and corporations who own tax-exempt securities in the amount of $100,000 or over; the amount of such holdings held by each individual or corporation; kind of securities held in each case; and the interest paid on such securities per annum.

I believe that the people and Members of Congress are entitled to have this information in order that they may find out how much of this money is going into the hands of the richest people in America in order to escape taxation. This is the only way you can get it, by passing a resolution of this kind. [Applause.] The purpose of this resolution is to ascertain approximately to what extent the big taxpayers and big business interests are escaping taxation in the higher income brackets by buying Federal, State, and local government tax-exempt bonds or other securities.

Certainly we need that information if we are going to formulate a remedy for a very serious situation arising out of the issuance of tax-exempt securities on a huge scale.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. Did the gentleman vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] stopping the issuing of tax-exempt securities?

Mr. FISH. It never got on the floor. I would have voted for it if it had.

Mr. McFARLANE. Oh, yes; it did.

Mr. FISH. Then I voted for it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is the gentleman in favor of it?

Mr. FISH. I certainly am. I am putting in an amendment today to stop the issuance of tax-exempt securities by a constitutional amendment. I put in the resolution I just read last year, but it did not get very far. A subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee considered it, but at the last moment the Treasury found some objection to it. Of course, the Treasury would object to it because tax-exempt Treasury notes are the easiest way to finance a deficit. It is the easiest way to finance all the expenditures of this administration or any other. What I want to emphasize is that we have $14,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities, of which nine billions have been issued within the last year and a half. Total tax-exempt securities amounting to the huge sum of forty-five billions have been issued. Federal tax-exempt securities are rapidly increasing and now amount to fourteen billions and fourteen billions more partially exempt. The question is whether we are going to issue more tax-exempt Treasury notes for the new deficit of four and one-half billion dollars next year. They are more popular today than ever before with big investors. The continued issuance of tax-exempt securities by the Federal Government is a serious question as to whether money badly needed in legitimate channels of trade and commerce and in all private industries is not being diverted into tax-exempt securities for the benefit of wealthy individuals and rich corporations. I am putting this up to the Democrats. I am making the speech, but you have the responsibility.

Do not take the floor and say you are in favor of it and talk for political purposes about soaking the rich and the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few and then do nothing about stopping the issuing of tax-exempt securities and let the rich man escape taxation altogether. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, the criticism that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] made in reference to the issuance of tax-exempt bonds is entirely just and justified. There is not a defense that can be offered to the practice in the United States of issuing great quantities of tax-exempt bonds, held mainly by the wealth of the country to escape taxation.

But the inconsistency of the gentleman from New York is that on the one hand he is not in favor of tax-exempt securities, but on the other hand he does not favor what he terms "tinkering" with the currency. Yet he admits that owing to the tremendous unemployment in the United States, either relief must be furnished to the unemployed or we must assume the responsibility of furnishing the work for them. The truth about the whole thing is simply this. From 1921 to 1929 we had the greatest credit inflation that this or any other country ever witnessed. As a result of that credit inflation commodity prices rose very high, and during that period a tremendous public and private indebtedness was contracted in terms of a cheap dollar. Then, following the crash of 1929, with the inevitable deflation which resulted from the preceding credit inflation, the dollar rose in value. It was not solely due to that, but that was one of the contributing causes to the increase in the purchasing power of the dollar. The dollar rose so high in value that in terms of commodities the debtors of the Nation found themselves burdened by a staggering public and private indebtedness. As a result of that situation business was paralyzed, and in my humble judgment the most serious problem that still confronts us is the crushing public and private indebtedness that is stifling business in the United States. The gentleman will admit that. Conservatives admit it, and so-called "progressives" admit it. But the problem is, How can we scale down this indebtedness? The gentleman perhaps would propose that we permit the laws of liquidation to assert themselves and that through foreclosure or bankruptcy and other court proceedings we permit the creditor class, through the usual recourse to law, to seize the property of the debtor class and appropriate the properties to the partial payment of obligations.

Gentlemen who make that statement do not realize the consequences that would ensue in the United States. That would produce the greatest concentration of wealth in a period of 2 or 3 years that the world has ever seen; and when we come out of such a liquidation, a very small percentage of the people would own and control all the property in the United States. The other method by which we could deal with the situation is to undertake by lowering the purchasing power of the dollar and by other methods to raise commodity prices so that the debtor can discharge his obligation in the same kind of a dollar that he borrowed. But, the gentleman says, that is tinkering with the currency; and when the gold inflation bill was before the Congress, the gentleman and other members of his party denounced that measure as a confiscation of wealth, and he now says that it constituted a capital levy to the extent of 40 percent. When this bill was before Congress, I had the pleasure of making the opening speech, and I then predicted in my speech that the mere reduction of the gold content of the dollar unaccompanied by the issuance of new currency placed in circulation would not accomplish a rise in commodity prices in the United States proportionate to the reduction of the gold content of the dollar. So far as our foreign trade is concerned, it did stimulate it, because foreign buyers were able to take an ounce of gold and buy 35 American dollars, whereas before the revaluation they could only purchase 20 American dollars, and with 35 dollars they could buy more of our products with the same ounce of gold. Put in another way, they could buy our products 40 percent cheaper. Then we passed the Silver Purchase Act, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has pronounced a dismal failure.

It is amusing to me to see the position gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber occupy. They say that we are interfering with the law of supply and demand, that we are undertaking by legislation to interfere with those natural laws. Yet the action of the party that was in control of this Government for many decades made necessary some of the legislation that we have put on the statute books. For years and years they interfered with the law of supply and demand by the enactment of tariff legislation. That was orthodox; they had no objection to that; but when we undertake to make the tariff laws function for the agricultural producers in the same way that it had been functioning for the industries of the East, then they talk about price fixing and say that it is contrary to the law of supply and demand and that it is un-American. Let me say to the gentleman that we might as well reconcile ourselves to one or two fundamental propositions in this country. We cannot eat our cake and have it, too. We can be either an export country or we can adopt a strict nationalistic policy, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] recommends; but the nationalistic policy that he recommends would necessitate economic dictatorship in the United States. If we commit ourselves to a course of economic isolation, then it is apparent that we must regulate and control production in the country. There are only two ways foreign countries can buy our products. They can pay for them only in goods or in gold. If we refuse to permit them to ship their goods into the United States in exchange for our surplus, then they have nothing else to use in settlement of international trade balances except gold. They did that for a long time, as long as the gold lasted, but the United States, with a favorable trade balance, soon got possession of nearly one-half of the gold of the world, and we had it locked in the vaults of our Federal Treasury.

Gold became cornered by three nations. It is, therefore, manifest that we cannot continue to have settlement in gold when nations do not possess the gold to settle with. The fact is that about the only thing that foreign nations have had to settle their international trade balances with, outside of imports, which to a restricted degree they have shipped into the United States, has been silver. The gentleman fails to recognize that for every dollar of silver that we buy abroad, we give some foreign buyer a purchasing power with which to settle international trade balances. The same thing might be said of copper. We could buy copper abroad and allow so much a pound for it, and that would give foreign buyers a purchasing power with which to settle international trade balances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield the gentleman from Texas 15 additional minutes.

Mr. DIES. I proposed a measure to enable foreign buyers to settle their international trade balances with silver; to accept silver at a premium not less than 10 percent, no more than 25 percent above the world market price of silver. That measure passed the House of Representatives, as you know; and when it went to the Senate, there were those who objected to it on the theory that it would constitute dumping. Then we passed my silver-purchase act, which is now in force.

It seems to me that we must recognize one of two things. We must either be prepared to lower our tariffs by reciprocal trade treaties, which the gentleman from Illinois denounces as being so vicious, or we must make it possible for foreign buyers to purchase our products. The gentleman deplores the expenditure of huge relief funds. Of course, none of us feels very happy about the necessity of appropriating billions of dollars for relief and public works.

I certainly do not. But what are you going to do? It is not a question about the wisdom of it, but what else can you do? The point I am making is that we are accumulating a tremendous public indebtedness which the American citizens, in generations yet to come, must discharge.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is a fact that while we have a staggering national debt of some $27,000,000,000, England has an indebtedness of about $46,000,000,000. The distinguished gentleman from Texas presents a dark picture of our financial condition. I am in agreement with what he says, and yet I wish to have the RECORD disclose that England's per capita debt is said to be $991 and the per capita debt in the United States is $370. It is true, however, that as we go forward in new-deal expenditures, we guard against impairment of our credit.

Mr. DIES. Oh, true; but God help this country if we ever emulate the example of Europe. We who live in this country who imagine that we are taxed ought to study taxation in foreign countries.

To illustrate the effect of gold revaluation from a theoretical or legal point of view: If the Supreme Court of the United States holds against the Government, it is conservatively estimated that that will increase the indebtedness of the United States $69,000,000,000. Why? Simply because if the Supreme Court holds that those obligations payable in gold must be discharged in gold or in the currency equivalent of gold, then it will become necessary for the debtor who owes an obligation payable in gold—and there are $100,000,000,000 of obligations payable in gold in the United States—to put up $35 for every ounce of gold he owes, instead of $20 under the old statute. Consequently, the indebtedness, in terms of dollars, will be increased $69,000,000,000 under that theory.

Of course, none of us know what the decision of the Court will be, but I have introduced a bill, in case that decision is unfavorable, directing the Secretary of the Treasury, in the event that in obedience to the mandate of the Supreme Court it becomes necessary for us to discharge our public obligation in the currency equivalent of gold, or on the basis of $35 an ounce, to issue $5,000,000,000 of United States notes, and pay that difference with United States notes. Men say "inflation." Well, it is a peculiar thing, to my mind, that during all of the credit inflation, when values were created out of thin air, when we were reveling in so-called "luxury and prosperity", that few sound orthodox bankers ever warned against inflation. There seems to be in this country a class of people who favor credit inflation and who denounce currency inflation. We might as well make up our minds to certain fundamental facts. We are either going to pass this indebtedness on to our children and our children's children or we must have the courage now, through lowering the purchasing power of the dollar, and other methods to raise commodity prices, to bring about the discharge of at least a reasonable part of this indebtedness during the lifetime of our own people. [Applause.] But they say it cannot be done. Now, the gentlemen who say that fail to realize that we are in a different attitude from any other country. For instance, when we revalued our gold, Professor Warren predicted that commodity prices would rise 40 percent. Many other gentlemen predicted that. No such thing happened. Why? Because we did not increase the quantity of our money one dollar; and we have in the Treasury today more gold back of our currency than ever before in the history of the United States. We have $8,000,000,000 of gold in the Treasury of the United States as against an outstanding currency issue of about $5,500,000,000. Not only was this true, but we are an export nation, and as an export nation other countries cannot call upon us for the settlement of debts. They cannot "raid" us.

The only way that a foreign country could raid our gold supply would be in case we foolishly resumed specie redemption, and the only way they could then do it would be to buy our currency and come to the Treasury and demand that that currency be redeemed in gold and transported abroad. The Congress is not going to do that. We respect the wisdom and authority of the Supreme Court of the United States. If the Supreme Court in its wisdom and judgment rules against the Government, we have a method by which we can save the American people from what I regard to be one of the most appalling economic tragedies that could ever happen to a free people. We can tax the obligations that are payable in gold after July 1, 1935. This will give creditors an opportunity to escape the tax by making the obligations payable in currency. These gentlemen talk about confiscation of wealth. Now, is it confiscation? The men who loaned their money between 1921 and 1929 loaned what kind of a dollar? They loaned a dollar that in terms of purchasing power was not worth more than 50 cents. After all, what other method do you have to measure dollars? What method do you have by which you can determine the value of a dollar except by the quantity of commodities that it will purchase? I say they loaned a dollar that in purchasing power was not worth more than 50 cents.

Then, when the subsequent deflation occurred and the purchasing power of the dollar increased and commodity prices fell, this same conservative crowd represented by the gentleman, or I should say he speaks for them, said it would be repudiation if we did not give them back $1.69. They are unwilling to accept the same kind of dollar in terms of purchasing power as that which they loaned.

It is all right to talk about the integrity of a country and about its reputation for honesty, but there never has been a country which went through a war such as we went through without expanding its currency so as to lower the purchasing power of its money and then and there settling it with the people then living. Oh, men throw their hands up in horror and talk about money tinkering and talk about silver being money tinkering! Why, silver is about the only real money left in the world. Gold is no longer money; it is not a medium of exchange. Money is something that circulates, and gold does not circulate any longer. It is no longer a reserve, because we do not have any gold in the banks as a reserve. The only purpose for which it is being used today is for hoarding by three great countries—France, the United States, and Great Britain—and the settlement of trade balances. Gentlemen, as I say, talk about cheap money. Let me tell you something: Money as the instrument of trade is supposed to increase as the production of a country increases. As the production of a country increases year by year, you need more of the instrument of exchange than you would otherwise. That is the reason why we see the quantity of money constantly increasing with the increase of production. If it lags behind, business will stagnate. If, on the other hand, through excessive issuance on the part of a central government it becomes redundant, then it becomes extremely cheap.

The analogy of a hundred ships carrying the cargoes from one country to another illustrates the purpose of money. It carries the cargo of trade, and when you have insufficient money, then the value of that instrument of exchange is unduly increased. There is no question but that the value of money is determined by the law of supply and demand just as is the value of any other commodity; and anyone who knows anything, knows that if Congress should deliberately undertake to issue large quantities of irredeemable paper, such money would depreciate to a tremendous degree; and we might as well recognize that other countries have either been forced into such desperate measures or have taken them deliberately. We, in this country, with $8,000,000,000 of gold and with nearly $1,000,000,000 of silver, are issuing tax-exempt bonds which result not only in withdrawing millions of dollars from the channels of trade and industry, and enable those of tremendous wealth to escape and evade our taxation laws, but also these tax-exempt bonds are a contributing factor to concentration of wealth; for, by enabling the privileged few to escape the burdens of taxation, this burden falls upon the middle classes and upon the wage earners and farmers.

You ask what is the remedy? The gentleman does not propose any remedy. I do not believe he is honoring me with his presence. I may be wrong about it, but I think sooner or later we are coming to it. As far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of transferring this enormous burden to my children and my children's children. I want some of it settled here and now by the generation responsible for these problems and responsible for this deplorable economic crisis. In order to make this generation assume its share of the burden, I would deliberately undertake to expand our currency. This can be done safely in the United States.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has done more work on the bonus question than any man in the United States. He is not here today, but you gentlemen know as well as I that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is due most of the credit, or at least a large part of the credit, for having over a long period of time, when it was unpopular, espoused it. I am not now discussing whether it ought to be paid or not to be paid, but the man who holds up his hands and cries "fiat money" and views with alarm the issuance of new money to pay the bonus fails to recognize that already since the revaluation of gold we have increased our supply of gold $1,000,000,000, and this at a time when all the conservative bankers said we were destroying the financial strength of the United States. In spite of their dire predictions we have $1,000,000,000 more gold in the Treasury today than we had when we revalued gold. We could issue money against this gold and have 100-percent backing for the currency we would issue under the Patman bill. What are we going to do? Shall we continue to issue tax-exempt bonds? The gentleman objects to the increase in income tax because he says it is soaking the rich. It is true that if you increase your income taxes you reach the point of diminishing returns and get less tax than you otherwise would, and the tax is to some extent passed on to the masses of our people.

What is the remedy? What is the remedy of the gentlemen who are prating about money tinkering? What are you going to do in your district and what am I going to do in my district with the thousands of unemployed people?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I have listened time and time again to all of this prating about unsound policies. Why, if it had not been for the credit inflation between the years 1921 and 1929 there would not be any necessity for tinkering with the currency. The only reason it is necessary to lower the purchasing power of the dollar today is on account of debts that were contracted with a cheap dollar and now have to be discharged with a high dollar. Our people just cannot do it.

How are you going to force liquidation? I see that the distinguished former head of the N. R. A., General Johnson, recommends liquidation. He and many thoughtful men in this country say the thing to do is to write it off, but how are you going to do that? Did we not pass a bankruptcy measure about 2 or 3 years ago? What happened? Did we not pass a municipal bankruptcy law to permit the municipalities to compose their debts? What happened? Where do we have the constitutional authority to compel creditors to scale down their indebtedness? If any man can tell me the authority under which we can do this, I should like to have him show it to me. The only way that Congress can reach the situation is through a sensible and sound currency expansion and other methods to increase commodity prices. I do not mean that as you increase the money all commodity prices will rise in the same proportion. I do not mean to imply it is a cure-all, but I say it is a necessary medicine that we have to take in this country. To increase indebtedness through the continued issuance of tax-exempt securities is to increase the burden of debt. As far as I am concerned, I trust that the opportunity will present itself to me to vote for the issuance of new money to take up some of these obligations or to discharge some of the obligations of the Government. I shall certainly oppose an overissue, and I appreciate the danger of excessive issues of currency.

Mr. Chairman, it is a long, hard battle. Every time you propose something with reference to silver there is a howl raised. These gentlemen do not want to lower the tariff, they do not want to accept goods; and yet, when you undertake to let the foreign nations pay for our surplus with silver, an objection is raised. The only reason silver was selected is because silver is money to about half the world. We can get it and store it in the Treasury and it does not compete with American industry. However, these gentlemen do not want that. They do not want to lower the tariff, and yet they cry "autocracy" when production is restricted.

May I say if we continue our nationalistic policies to protect everything in the United States and refuse to meet competition in foreign countries, we might just as well get ready to pass a Bankhead bill relating to every agricultural commodity and industry in the country. We might just as well accept the consequences of economic isolation, which is economic dictatorship, because there is no escape. It seems to me that when these gentlemen from day to day continue to denounce the administration they are making a mistake. I do not feel good about all of this. It is worrying me as it is every other Member of this House. I have talked to nearly all the Members of this House, in the cloakroom and various other places, and I do not know of a Member of the House who is not worrying tremendously on account of this situation.

We do not want to spend money on relief, but what are you going to do—let them starve? When you come in with the public-works proposition, some say "We do not want public works, we want the dole." Yet 2 years ago every big-business man in the country was denouncing the dole. When we undertake to keep away from the dole, which is demoralizing our people, then they come in and say that the public works is too expensive.

It is all right to criticize and condemn. No doubt there are some of the things that we are doing that are not wise. I do not think the N. R. A. in every respect has been a success by any means, but I think it has accomplished some definite good.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber at the present time. On his behalf I ask unanimous consent that he have the privilege of extending and revising his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3973, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS (H. DOC. NO. 32)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered printed.

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 21 of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands", I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the report of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands for the calendar year 1933, together with appendixes, consisting of abridged reports of the heads of the six departments of the Philippine government for the calendar year 1933.

I concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of War that this report and its appendixes be printed as a congressional document.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1935.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by section 19 of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, entitled "An act to declare the purpose of the people of the United States as to the future political status of the people of the Philippine Islands, and to provide a more autonomous government for those islands", I transmit herewith a copy of Act No. 4104, passed by the Ninth Philippine Legislature at its third session, and a set of the laws and resolutions enacted by the Ninth Philippine Legislature during its third special session, from April 30 to May 5, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1935.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith Executive Orders No. 6775 (Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (c)) and No. 6776 (Veterans' Regulations No. 8 (a)), approved by me June 30, 1934.

Executive Order No. 6775 amends Executive Order No. 6566 (Veterans' Regulation No. 6 (b)), January 19, 1934, and Executive Order No. 6776 effected the cancelation of Executive Order No. 6096, March 31, 1933.

These regulations were promulgated in accordance with the terms of title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1935.

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a brief statement and then submit a unanimous-consent request.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had money appropriated to make its investigation in the holding-company field. This appropriation expired, of course, at the close of the last Congress. There are about 30,000 proof pages to be read and there is a young man and a young woman in the office now who are doing this work. They cannot be paid unless I get unanimous consent to use a part of this fund, as has been done in other cases. There is $10,500 which the committee did not use and which will be turned back into the Treasury.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman taken this matter up with the ranking Republican member of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I did not think to do that. I am sure it will be all right with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], but I cannot speak for him.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I do not want to object to the gentleman's request, but, of course, it is customary to confer with the ranking minority Member.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman has any objection at all, I shall withdraw the request until a later date; but I think I may say that the gentleman from Ohio would not object.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. With that assurance, I shall not object.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that $500 of this amount may be made available until the 1st of March to pay these two employees who cannot be paid until this is done.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that $500 of the amount unexpended in the utilities-investigation fund be made available for the payment of the salary of two employees until March 1 next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 17, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARING

The House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will meet at 10 a. m. Thursday, January 17, room 445, House Office Building, to hold public hearings on bill H. R. 2753, regarding cancelation of citizenship of naturalized Americans who voted in the plebiscite in the Saar region, Germany.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

123. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of designs, aircraft parts, and aeronautical accessories purchased by the War Department, the prices therefor and the reason for the award in each case; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

124. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated January 9, 1935, transmitting report of the withdrawals and restorations of public lands in certain cases; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

125. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting 2 sets of the 4 classes of the general rules and regulations, as required by section 14 of the Seamen's Act, approved March 4, 1915, and as prescribed by the Board of Supervising Inspectors, with 3 supplements thereto; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

126. A letter from the vice president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., transmitting a report for the year 1934; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

127. A letter from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting report of statistical studies performed by the Department of Labor for other than Government activities; to the Committee on Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. BUCHANAN: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 88. Joint resolution making additional appropriations for the Federal Communications Commission, the National Mediation Board, and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935; without amendment (Rept. No. 6). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri: Committee on Appropriations. H. R. 3973. A bill making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. No. 7). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES: Committee on Agriculture. H. R. 3247. A bill to meet the conditions created by the 1934 drought, and to provide for loans to farmers in drought- and storm-stricken areas, and for other purposes; with amendment (Rept. No. 8). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

The bill (H. R. 1220) granting a pension to Venia Moody; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 1685) granting a pension to Mary P. Paul; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Warner, executive secretary, recommending to the President and the Congress of the United States that the Civilian Conservation Corps be increased in numbers to 1,000,000 enrollees; also conservation of natural resources through the trinity of source-stream control by forestation, by soil-erosion prevention, and by many small slack-water reservoirs; to the Committee on Labor.

197. Also, petition of Local Union No. 1802 of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, requesting the Honorable ROBERT F. WAGNER, Senator of the State of New York, to introduce again his labor-disputes bill, in its original form, with certain amendments; and urging Senators and Representatives to support this bill in its amended form as herein suggested; to the Committee on Labor.

198. Also, petition of the Ohio Buckeye Brewers Association, of Cleveland, Ohio, requesting that Members of Congress give early consideration to the reduction of the present taxes on beer and other brewery products; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

199. Also, petition of the City Council of Maple Heights, Ohio, endorsing and bringing to the attention of the Seventy-fourth Congress of the United States, the workers' unemployment and social insurance bill, known as "House bill 7593"; to the Committee on Labor.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God and Father of mankind, ere we enter upon the duties of another day we would first commit our soul and life to Thy almighty care. Lead us, O Father, just as Thou wilt, and when and where, for Thou alone canst direct our wills by noble motives in accordance with the claims on us of right and love.

If we have lingered overlong in the valley of contentment and a stern fate mocks our selfish aims, give us the courage of men who dare to scale the heights where we may see the everlasting things that matter for our Nation, the peaks of honor, truth, and righteousness, and, clad in spotless white, the towering pinnacle of sacrifice, pointing with pierced hand to the city that hath eternal foundation whose builder and maker is God.

We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Savior. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 16, 1935, when, on request of Mr. ROBINSON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 88) making additional appropriations for the Federal Communications Commission, the National Mediation Board, and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM NEW MEXICO—NOTICE OF CONTEST

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from J. W. Gum, attorney at law, Washington, D. C., submitting a notice served by Dennis Chavez, of New Mexico, upon Hon. BRONSON M. CUTTING of his intention to contest the right of Mr. CUTTING to a seat in the Senate for the term beginning January 3, 1935, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who are detained on official business.

I regret to announce the absence of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON], occasioned by illness, they being confined to their rooms.

I repeat the announcement as to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator-elect from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] on business of the Senate in connection with the Philippine Commission.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is absent in the Philippines on the business of the Senate; that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is unavoidably detained; and that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] is absent on account of a death in his family.

I wish further to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] is necessarily absent and that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

COST-ASCERTAINMENT REPORT, POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting, pursuant to law, the cost-ascertainment report of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1934, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

INDUSTRIAL PRICES AND THEIR RELATIVE INFLEXIBILITY (S. DOC. NO. 13)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting, pursuant to Senate Resolution 17 (submitted by Mr. BORAH and agreed to on Jan. 7, 1935), a report prepared by Gardiner C. Means, economic adviser on finance, touching the subject of industrial prices and their relative inflexibility, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed with illustrations.

SEPTEMBER REPORT OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATOR

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Administrator, covering the period of September 1 to September 30, 1934, inclusive, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by 101 members of Wayne County Post, No. 3200, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Jesup, Ga., condemning the action of 135 of the veterans' rank-and-file committee which left Savannah, Ga., for Washington, D. C., for the purpose of forming a bonus march and other allied activities and to excite sympathy in favor of the payment of adjusted-service certificates, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Adjutant General (Edwin S. Bettelheim, Jr.) of the Military Order of the World War, embodying a resolution adopted by the fourteenth annual convention of that order at Miami, Fla., opposing the entry of the United States into either the League of Nations or the World Court, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of the committee of the Ladies Society to the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Lodge No. 428, of Emporia, Kans., protesting against the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COPELAND presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, memorializing Congress to consider legislation looking to either taking all profits out of war or putting the business of the manufacturing of munitions of war solely in the hands of the Government, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. WAGNER on Jan. 15, 1935, p. 450, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COPELAND also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New York, favoring the Federal regulation of milk produced in other States and marketed within the State of New York under similar regulations applied by the State to milk produced within its borders, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. WAGNER on Jan. 15, 1935, p. 451, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COPELAND also presented a resolution of the Assembly of the State of New York, memorializing Congress to take appropriate action designating Floyd Bennett Field Airport in Brooklyn, N. Y., as an air-mail service station for New York City and evirons, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. WAGNER on Jan. 15, 1935, p. 451, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. COPELAND also presented resolutions adopted by Warren G. Harding Council, No. 118, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Mineola, and the North Side Council of United Unemployed of Nassau County, Williston Park, Long Island, both in the State of New York, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in full in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution, which I am sending to the desk, adopted by the Board of Commissioners of the City of Orange, N. J., urging that sufficient funds be appropriated to permit the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to continue its work.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF CITY CLERK,
Orange, N. J.

I, William F. Christiansen, city clerk of the city of Orange, in the county of Essex, and State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that the following annexed is a true copy of the records in my office relating to taxes and Home Owners' Loan Corporation:

"Resolved by the Board of Commissioners of the City of Orange, N. J., That whereas the department of revenue and finance did, for and at the request of the directors of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, remove and take out from the list of properties advertised to be sold at its tax sale held on November 2, 1934, certain properties on which liens for tax arrears were then due and owing to the city of Orange; and

"Whereas the owners of the aforesaid mentioned properties have been informed by the directors of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation that the said Corporation has no further funds on hand with which to refinance the aforesaid properties: Now, therefore,

"The board of commissioners of the city of Orange, after due and careful consideration of the matters aforesaid, do respectfully petition the President of the United States and Congress that there be appropriated at the next session of Congress a sum of money sufficient to carry out the terms of the contemplated mortgage loans on properties of the aforesaid described home owners under the same terms and conditions as heretofore. The said board of commissioners deem it necessary and wise that there be a resumption and completion of the loans heretofore promised.

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and the honorable United States Senators from New Jersey, Messrs. W. WARREN BARBOUR and A. HARRY MOORE, and to Congressman PETER A. CAVICCHIA, of the Eleventh District of New Jersey.

"WALTER B. SAVAGE,
"O. C. BIANCHI,
"CHAS. IPPOLITO,
"JOHN J. CONDRON.
"Board of Commissioners."

Adopted January 8, 1935.

WM. F. CHRISTIANSEN,
City Clerk.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and the corporate seal of said city of Orange, on this 10th day of January, A. D. 1935.

NATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday there was held here at the Capital a national monetary conference, made up of representatives of some 16 organizations interested in a solution of our monetary problems.

The delegates attending the conference represented the Sound Money League, the national farm organizations, the national veterans' organizations, the Committee for the Nation, the National Depositors Committee, the American Society of Martians, the National Union for Social Justice, the American Monetary Reform Association, the Public Ownership League of America, and the Western States Silver Conference.

The conference adopted resolutions, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF NATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE HELD AT WASHINGTON, D. C., JANUARY 16, 1935

Resolved, That the object of this National Monetary Conference is that there be established an equitable price level for the goods, commodities, and services of this country; to assure to labor a living, just, and annual wage; to guarantee to the farmer a price that will cover the cost of production plus a profit; to protect the profit motive in commerce and industry, and to relieve the taxpayer from a present unjust burden.

Resolved, That the only means to secure the afore-mentioned objective, which we conferees jointly undertake to support, are contained in the following program, which comes strictly within the constitutional power of Congress to enact.

Resolved, That the following program designed to accomplish the aforesaid ends be set up in proper form for legislative enactment by the Congress of the United States.

Resolved, That the full force and power of the organizations whose representatives are here assembled be placed behind the passage of this program.

Resolved, That article I, section 8, clause 5, of the Constitution of the United States, in providing that "Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins * * *" fixes the responsibility of Congress for the kind and value of our monetary unit, or units, the status of our banking and monetary system, and the necessity of the perfecting of that system to meet the exigencies of our economic development. In consequence, we do hereby demand:

1. That the 12 Federal Reserve banks be converted into a new central bank, Government-owned and Government-operated, with the merging of all present functions, powers, and services for the Federal issue and control of all credit and currency, including demand bank deposits, the said central bank to be authorized and directed to acquire the assets of banks closed since January 1, 1930.

2. That a sound and adequate currency be forthwith supplied the people of this Nation, first, by detaching the dollar from a fixed relationship to gold, that we may successfully cope with the effects of the manipulation of depreciated currencies of foreign nations; second, by remonetizing silver in order more effectually to accomplish such purpose.

3. That such central bank be the sole bank of issue of the currency of the Nation.

4. That to secure immediately a substantial increase in the purchasing power on the part of the most widely distributed group of creditors and potential consumers—in fact, the only group of creditors of the United States Government who have accepted its obligations and are willing and anxious for their redemption in non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes; namely, the holders of adjusted-compensation certificates—that these veterans be paid forthwith in full in the currency of the United States.

5. That hereafter the public borrowing of the United States Government shall cease, and in lieu of the present practice of issuing tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds that the new central bank issue non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes retirable when necessary by taxation.

6. That when and as the present obligations of the United States become due and payable they be retired by an exchange of legal-tender notes of issue from the new central bank.

7. That the internal purchasing power of the dollar be established at an equitable price level, at least that of 1926, maintained and controlled by expansion and contraction of the volume of currency and credit, and to achieve the desired price level for basic commodities, that the value of the dollar in terms of foreign currencies be controlled through operations of an equalization fund maintained for such purpose.

8. That for the guidance of Congress in a fuller understanding of the present low prices of agricultural commodities there be referred to the proper committee of Congress and accompanied by a proper appropriation a mandate to investigate the identity of holders of the outstanding obligations of the United States as of January 1, 1935, and of the real owners as distinguished from the nominal holders, together with the names and identities of all who have become creditors of the United States Government since January 1, 1935, with the object of determining and disclosing potential enemies of this Nation here or abroad.

Signatories:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the legislative program of the National Grange, as adopted at the recent annual session of that great farm organization. I urge upon Senators that they study this program carefully. With much of it I find myself in full accord. The Grange has been a powerful influence for advancement in the agricultural thought of this country for many years, and its views are the expression of the views held by a large part of the farm interests of the United States. I ask that the resolutions be printed as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL GRANGE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

1. NATIONAL RECOVERY PROGRAM

While it is the declared policy of Congress, as expressed in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, to reestablish and maintain the same price parity between agricultural and industrial commodities which existed in the pre-war period, this objective has not been realized. As the year 1934 drew to a close, the average price level of farm products stood at 102 of pre-war, while industrial prices averaged 126, giving the farm dollar a purchasing power of 81 cents. This does not include rental or benefit payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. But it is worthy of note that only about one-half of the farmers of the country are engaged in the production of so-called "basic commodities", upon which rental or benefit payments are made. Justice and the national interest alike demand that all arbitrary and artificial price boosting in industry must stop until farm prices are brought to an equality with industrial prices.

We demand the observance and enforcement of section 3 of the National Recovery Act, which forbids code provisions calculated to eliminate or suppress small enterprises, and which expressly prohibits monopolies or monopolistic practices.

2. SURPLUS CONTROL

Drafted to meet a great emergency the Agricultural Adjustment Act is recognized as being experimental in character. It shall cease to be in effect whenever the President finds and proclaims that the emergency has ended. Acreage control has been of value in the case of certain crops, and benefit payments have had a tendency to restore farm purchasing power. As a result of the drought acreage restrictions are not now so seriously needed, but guidance and balance will be essential to ease agriculture through this period of readjustment. With practically all of our burdensome surpluses under control, with an actual shortage in seed and forage, little acreage reduction is required for 1935, and we hope for the gradual elimination of governmental restrictions.

3. LAND UTILIZATION

The goal of any long-time policy for land utilization should be the preservation of the family and the medium-sized farm unit. Corporation farming is un-American and fatal to both democracy and our type of agriculture. The very large farm should not receive encouragement from the Government.

Following is a concise outline of Grange policy on this question:

(a) There should be no expenditure of public funds for the development of new irrigation or reclamation projects until there is a demand at profitable prices for the products that such lands will produce. Sound policy demands that if, under prevailing conditions, new land is brought under cultivation at public expense, the Government should purchase and retire from agricultural production a much greater amount of submarginal land.

(b) Submarginal agricultural land should be utilized for timber production, recreational uses, game preserves, or other suitable purposes.

(c) The present efforts of the Government to arrest soil erosion throughout the country should be continued. Increasing attention should be given to soil conservation in the development of a permanent national policy. In the interest of administrative efficiency and economy this work should be transferred to the Department of Agriculture, where it properly belongs.

(d) Such additional soil surveys as may be needed to enable us intelligently to appraise the value of our lands should be made promptly.

(e) The Federal Government should cooperate to the fullest extent with those States that are now making soil surveys.

(f) In the establishment of subsistence homesteads due care must be exercised that the families located upon these projects do not become a burden to rural taxpayers.

With agriculture still struggling for equality we oppose any subsidized competition in commercial food production.

(g) We favor the restoration of the Bureau of Soils as a separate entity under the Department of Agriculture.

(h) The Bureau of Reclamation should be transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture.

4. TAXATION

The mounting deficits sustained by the Federal Treasury emphasize the need of economy in governmental expenditures.

Falsifying of records and juggling of tax statements are making it possible for a large amount of property to escape its just share of the cost of government. We condemn every form of tax evasion, whether it be by failure to list taxable property, the falsifying of income-tax and other tax statements, the shifting of ownership to holding companies, or the common practice of large corporations of making two financial statements, one for taxation purposes and the other as a basis for rate making.

The present situation calls for heavy income and inheritance taxes in the higher brackets, especially upon high and excessive salary incomes, together with excessive corporation profits. The gift tax must be high enough to prevent tax evasions.

We reaffirm our vigorous opposition to the imposition of a general sales tax, because such a tax ignores the principle of ability to pay and is a tax upon the necessities of the people.

We oppose the further issuance of tax-exempt bonds and securities.

We favor the appointment of a Federal commission to make a study of our whole system of taxation, Federal and State, with a view to securing better coordination and greater economy in the assessment and collection of taxes.

5. MOTOR TRANSPORTATION

We approve of the appropriations made by the Federal Government for highway construction. The Grange believes that the time has come when more consideration should be given to the improvement of farm-to-market and post roads. Following is an outline of the position assumed by the Grange regarding various proposals for further legislation to regulate and tax motor vehicles:

(a) The interest and safety of the public require enforcement of proper restrictions regarding the size, weight, and speed of all vehicles moving over the public highway.

(b) Such regulations should be uniform as between the several States, and there should be reciprocity between the States, based on such uniformity.

(c) The power to regulate is a police power lodged with the States. As a basis for regulation, we commend to all the States adoption of the Uniform Code for the Regulation of Traffic, approved by the American Association of State Highway Officials and the United States Bureau of Public Roads.

(d) With respect to highway taxation, each motor vehicle should be taxed its fair share of the cost of the highways which it uses. The State should be the sole taxing agency.

(e) Every special tax collected for highway improvement should be conserved for that purpose alone. Consequently no gasoline tax diversion should be permitted.

(f) No taxation or regulation of motor vehicles should be permitted which has for its purpose any increase in cost or restriction in use, in order to equalize competition between motor transportation and other forms of transportation.

6. RAILROADS

One of the prime reasons for the continued financial embarrassment of the railroads is the unwieldy, interest-bearing debt structure which the managers of the roads have saddled upon their properties. Nearly 60 percent of the capitalization of the carriers is in the form of bonds rather than stocks.

Railroads should cooperate to reduce competitive expenses; unnecessary services should be abandoned; metropolitan terminals should be consolidated and circuitous haulage should be eliminated. We believe that the railroads should be permitted to engage in motor transportation under proper conditions, and we favor the elimination of some of the restrictions on railroads which were necessary when they had a monopoly of land transportation.

We oppose placing water and motor transportation in interstate or foreign commerce under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the sole function of which has been to regulate the railroads.

7. INLAND WATERWAYS

We are in favor of the development and improvement of our inland waterways, when practical and economically sound, for the promotion of our foreign and domestic commerce.

8. TARIFF POLICY

Following is an outline of the tariff policy adopted by the National Grange:

(a) So long as the American protective policy is maintained, we favor such rates of import duty as will insure the American market to the American farmer upon farm commodities which can be produced advantageously in any part of our country.

(b) Since it is well understood that producers of surplus crops receive no direct tariff benefits, equality and justice demand that import duties on commodities which the farmer must buy should be fixed at fair and reasonable levels.

(c) We advocate that growers of crops of which we produce an exportable surplus shall be accorded benefits to equalize tariff costs, as through the medium of processing taxes, or as provided under the export debenture plan.

(d) Because the natural resources of the country should be wisely used and conserved for the benefit of this and succeeding generations, we affirm that it is contrary to sound public policy to impose tariffs for the protection of such resources as cannot be renewed when they are once exhausted.

(e) In no case should tariff rates be granted which breed monopoly, enriching the few at the expense of the many, and which encourage inefficiency rather than efficiency in American industry.

(f) We reaffirm the long-established policy of the Grange in demanding "tariff for all or tariff for none."

(g) In no case should reciprocal trade agreements be made with other nations that will deprive the American farmer of the home market.

9. AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

The Farm Credit Administration deserves to be commended for the good work it has done. We urge the appropriation of $300,000,000 by the Seventy-fourth Congress for the continuation of Commissioner's loans during the present emergency.

We favor the reduction of interest rates to the lowest point consistent with a sound loaning policy.

We approve of the work of the farm debt conciliation commissions functioning in the several States. However, debt-conciliation supervisors should be appointed by the conciliation commissions themselves, and F. E. R. A. funds should not be used in compensating them.

We urge Congress to restore to farmer borrowers the right to name a majority of the directors of the Federal land banks, as was provided in the original farm-loan act.

The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration should not be permitted to dismiss without cause district directors of the land banks, as he may do under the Farm Credit Act of 1933.

10. MONETARY STABILIZATION

The Grange stands for an honest dollar, a dollar that will be fair to debtor and creditor alike. We are in favor of expanding the currency to such an extent as to reestablish the 1926 price level. The President should immediately establish the maximum price for gold authorized by Congress. This would serve the two-fold purpose of lifting prices and restoring confidence.

To save interest on the public debt we believe that it would be sound policy for the Government to issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes not exceeding $3,000,000,000 in providing relief funds or financing any further Public Works projects which may be undertaken. In issuing such currency, however, it is essential to make definite provision for its redemption at a given rate per year.

Guaranteeing bank deposits as now provided under the operations of the Federal Depository Insurance Corporation should be continued.

11. PRICES OF FARM MACHINERY

We favor congressional action directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate corporations engaged in the manufacture, sale, or distribution of agricultural implements and machinery to definitely establish whether or not unfair trade practices and price-fixing agreements are responsible for the continued unreasonably high prices demanded of farmers for such implements and machinery.

12. ELECTRIC-POWER PROJECTS

We favor the maximum development and completion of all Government electric-power plants, including the building of main transmission lines in a manner that will deliver power to the rural people and to others under Government operation and control at the lowest possible cost.

13. PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT

We advocate the amendment of the Packers and Stockyards Act to provide for the more effective regulation by the Department of Agriculture of the marketing of livestock. Direct buying by the packers merely in an effort to evade the law and depress prices must not be further tolerated.

Packers should likewise be prevented from engaging in large-scale feeding projects, either directly or through financial interest.

14. AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

With added responsibilities resting upon them under prevailing conditions, we favor adequate appropriations for our agricultural colleges and the experiment stations.

The Grange heartily approves the appropriations made by the Federal Government for the support of vocational education. These appropriations represent an investment paying substantial dividends.

We recommend that the Smith-Lever Act be so amended as to forbid direct or indirect contributions to the Agricultural Extension Service on the part of private citizens, chambers of commerce, farm organizations, or similar groups, so that extension workers shall be paid entirely from public funds, leaving them free to serve the people without favoritism or discrimination. In no case should the extension service be dominated by any particular farm organization.

15. BUREAU OF FORESTRY

The Grange reaffirms its opposition to the proposed transfer of the Bureau of Forestry from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior. Such a transfer would result in duplication and overlapping of governmental functions and activities; it would encourage the wasteful and extravagant expenditure of public funds and be detrimental to the forests and subversive of the public interest.

16. PURE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Nearly 30 years of experience in the administration of the Pure Food and Drugs Act has shown its great value, besides disclosing certain inadequacies to control present-day abuses. This legislation should be so amended as to bring collateral advertising within the scope of the act.

17. PREDATORY ANIMALS

Since farmers and stockmen in various sections of the country have suffered burdensome losses due to the ravages of coyotes, prairie dogs, rodents, and predatory animals generally by reason of insufficient appropriations for the control of these pests, we advocate adherence to the 10-year program adopted by Congress in this connection.

18. TREE DISEASES AND PESTS

We urge the Federal Government to take prompt and effective steps looking to the eradication of the Dutch elm disease, which threatens to destroy one of our stateliest trees is not speedily eradicated. The acceleration of control measures in connection with the white-pine blister rust and the gypsy moth is also imperative.

19. MIGRATORY WILD FOWL

The Grange condemns as unfair the baiting of migratory wild fowl on hunting preserves for the purpose of their slaughter, and we ask the Biological Survey to formulate regulations to prevent this practice.

20. RURAL MAIL SERVICE

We believe that the adoption of the contract system, as advocated in some quarters, would be detrimental to the Rural Delivery System. We are opposed to such a move, or any other step that would in any way endanger, hinder, or interfere with the regular and efficient distribution of mail to rural communities. We favor restoration of the 2-cent rate on first-class matter.

21. IMPORTED FATS AND OILS

The Grange favors a processing tax on imported oils sufficiently high to protect the domestic producer.

22. IMITATION DAIRY PRODUCTS

It is of vital interest to the dairy industry as well as to the consuming public that all legislation for the control and regulation of manufacturers of and dealers in imitation dairy products should remain in full force and effect. We emphasize our support of the essential features of a proper oleomargarine-control law, namely:

(a) Adequate licensing of manufacturers, wholesalers, and retail dealers.

(b) An inclusive definition of the imitation product, including color specifications.

(c) Clear provisions for labeling and notice to the buyer.

(d) License fees and tax sufficient to cover Government cost of enforcing the law.

The Grange asks for such legislation as may be necessary to prevent mail-order or other interstate sales of oleomargarine which are in violation of such laws as are now in force or may hereafter be enacted.

23. PROTECTION OF POULTRY INDUSTRY

Under prevailing conditions, we favor an embargo on the importation of foreign eggs in any form. We believe that eggs should be dated when put in cold storage and plainly labeled as storage eggs when sold.

24. CONTROL OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

The results following the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, which speak for themselves, emphasize the need of doing everything possible to protect society against the ill effects of the liquor traffic. We are as much opposed to this demoralizing traffic as ever. The Grange's position on this question is summarized as follows:

(a) We oppose the sale of intoxicants in the immediate vicinity of churches, schools, and colleges.

(b) We oppose the advertising of intoxicants over the radio, in newspapers or magazines, and in moving-picture theaters.

(c) The element of profit should be eliminated as much as possible from the manufacture, distribution, and sale of intoxicants.

(d) We favor the adoption of adequate measures by the Government to protect dry States from the shipment of intoxicating liquor across their borders from wet territory, fulfilling the pledge that was made by the advocates of repeal.

(e) We are opposed to excessive taxes on liquor, since excessive taxation will encourage bootlegging, official corruption, and general violation of the law.

(f) We recommend that granges throughout the land join with other organizations in promoting a campaign of education, calling attention to the evil effects of strong drink, exposing the fallacy of the idea that any nation can drink its way to prosperity, and emphasizing the truth that decency and sobriety are virtues that bring their own reward.

25. TAKING PROFITS OUT OF WAR

The Grange reaffirms its position in favor of taking the profits out of war. Legislation should be enacted providing that in the event of future armed conflict, wealth as well as man power should be conscripted, while the manufacture of armaments and munitions for national defense should be vested in the Government. In the case of war involving other nations, we favor the placing of an embargo upon the sale of war materials to the combatants.

We heartily approve of the Senatorial investigation of the munitions industry and ask Congress to make the necessary appropriation to complete this inquiry.

26. REGULATING COMMODITY EXCHANGES

The Grange advocates needed legislation prohibiting pure gambling on commodity exchanges dealing in agricultural products.

27. UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

The Grange believes that putting the unemployed to work on useful public projects is far preferable to the dole. Every able-bodied person receiving Government relief should be required to render a commensurate return. The wage scale, as well as hours of labor, on Government projects should be in accord with those of the locality in which the work is done.

28. OLD-AGE PENSIONS

The Grange is opposed to any form of old-age pension that will discourage thrift and saving during the person's productive years, but strongly favors a contributory system of old-age insurance.

29. REGISTRATION OF ALIENS

The Grange favors legislation requiring that all aliens be registered by the Federal Government and compelled to pay a registration fee of from $5 to $10. Those who fail to become naturalized within a period of 10 years should be deported. We oppose any weakening of the present immigration laws.

30. LAND LEASED BY ALIENS

In some sections of the United States undesirable aliens are leasing land or acquiring ownership in the name of their children. In the opinion of the Grange, legislation should be enacted making it impossible for children born in the United States of alien parents to own or lease land until attaining the age of 21 years, when such children should be required to choose their allegiance.

31. CHILD LABOR AMENDMENT

While the Grange is in full sympathy with all measures prohibiting the exploitation of child labor in industrial pursuits, particularly such as are detrimental to health, interfere with the opportunity of acquiring a good common-school education, or those that subject the workers to physical danger, we are not in favor of the sweeping grant of power which would be conferred upon Congress by the ratification of the proposed child labor amendment to the Federal Constitution.

32. TRAIL SMELTER DAMAGES

We urge the Federal Government to do all in its power to secure speedy justice for those farmers in the State of Washington whose crops and livestock have been damaged and whose health has been impaired by the sulphurous fumes of the Trail Smelter, located across the boundary line in British Columbia. Any settlement of the case should make provision for future control of the smelter fumes.

33. HOLDING COMPANIES

The Grange favors the enactment of drastic legislation that will protect the American people from further exploitation and injustice on the part of large holding companies.

34. MOTION-PICTURE REGULATION

We deplore the offenses against decency committed by the motion-picture industry, and we advocate Federal regulation of the production of all films entering into interstate commerce to protect public morals and establish higher standards.

35. TRUTH IN FABRICS

We favor legislation for truth in fabrics, both for the benefit of agriculture and for the protection of the consumer.

36. WORLD PEACE

The Grange earnestly advocates that the Government of the United States should continue to exert every effort to promote peace and good will among nations. Since disarmament on a purely national basis is not practicable, we cherish the hope that our Government may use its best endeavors to bring about reduction in armaments on an international scale.

We reaffirm our endorsement of the World Court with reservations sufficient to fully protect the rights and interests of the United States.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD a letter, with enclosure, I just received from a Minnesota veteran in favor of payment of the bonus. It is typical of letters sent by veterans and indicates in no uncertain terms the feeling prevalent among them, and justly so. The writer of this letter, Mr. Johnson, requests that it be brought to the attention of the Senate, and I therefore ask that it be placed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOUND, MINN., January 14, 1935.

Hon. Senator SCHALL,

DEAR SENATOR: Roosevelt cannot pay the bonus but can buy all the land at the cost of $675,000,000. He can borrow $8,400,000,000 to make the rich man richer. He can also pay some old drunk $200 per month that never did anything in his life for the country nor anybody else. But he can't pay the bonus. He can buy up all the little pigs and kill them off and pay the farmer to leave his land lay idle and he can't pay the bonus. President Roosevelt can buy hay from Canada and let England go by on default on the war debt. When Mr. Roosevelt was elected President of the United States he said he had something up his sleeve for the veterans, and he did. He cut the veterans off that had no legs nor arms; he also promised us a balanced Budget in 1932; since that time he has not paid the bonus and the national debt grows larger every day. A year ago today I had 32 cows, 7 horses, some young stock, 150 chickens, and all kinds of machinery. Today I have 4 cows, 2 horses, and hardly any machinery, and no feed. Still he says the times are better under the Roosevelt depression. I have five children, hardly any clothes on them, and I am wearing a pair of shoes I have worn for a year. If there were a few more men like Senator ——— and Senator ——— they would give the Government to the Mellons, Du Ponts, Rockefellers, and the bankers but would not pay the bonus. If we had men like those two Senators here in Minnesota we would do to them what we did to Mr. Hoidale when he ran for United States Senator last fall.

He voted "no" for the bonus when he was in the House, and when he ran for Senator we voted "no", you stay at home, and he did. When Mr. Regan ran for Governor we gave him the same answer. We want men in Washington who do not have to be told by President Roosevelt—vote on such bills as the bonus. We do not need the bonus when our children are grown up, we need it now—this winter. HUEY LONG has the right idea—that Washington wants to see the big man get bigger and the small smaller. We, the people of Minnesota, do not send to Washington men like —— and ——; we send men who know how to vote. We soldiers won't forget when it comes 1936. We have already made up our minds how we will vote. We want men who appreciate what us soldiers did and not for men to use us like dogs now. In war time, when the people at home were getting $10 or $15 a day, us soldiers received $1 a day, laid in mud, went over the top when we were told, and didn't retreat like this present administration is doing. We did what we promised to do when we raised our right hand to God. We promised to obey the United States Government, and he don't want to pay the bonus. Senator SCHALL, I request you to read this letter on the Senate floor. Wishing you a happy New Year, I am,

Yours respectfully,

ARCHIE JOHNSON.

P. S.—Please answer this letter.

LAND-BUYING PLAN DRAFTED

WASHINGTON, January 11 (A. P.).—A huge program to spend $675,000,000 in buying up poor land and retiring it from farm production was recommended to President Roosevelt Friday by the National Resources Board.

The purchasing would be extended over 15 years, 5,000,000 acres being bought each year at an annual cost of $45,000,000.

This farm land, comprising 450,000 farms, should be withdrawn from agriculture, the Board said, "in order that both the natural and human resources of the Nation may be conserved."

The report, drawn by the Board's land-planning committee, was supplementary to the Board's earlier study, which President Roosevelt told Congress would guide the expenditure of $4,000,000,000 in his new work-making program.

It urged that the Federal Government and the States take steps to prevent further settlement of lands so poor that occupancy is "clearly contrary to the public interest." It turned thumbs down on any "substantial movement of unemployed people from urban areas into commercial agriculture."

Land to be retired, the committee suggests, may be added to the national forests or leased to States for wildlife refuges, parks, and the like.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 859) to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1935, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 13) thereon.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION OF THE MUNITIONS INDUSTRY

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate Resolution No. 8, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the resolution has not as yet been read in its entirety.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 8), submitted by Mr. NYE on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Vice President, under authority of Senate Resolution 206, agreed to on April 12, 1934, to investigate the munitions industry hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $100,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized to be expended for the purposes set forth in said resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am advised that this resolution and its provisions are agreeable to the chairman of the committee, and I have no objection to its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 5, after the word "Senate", to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$50,000"; and in line 7, after the word "resolution", to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the committee is requested to report to the Senate, on or before April 1, recommendations for legislation at this session of Congress based upon the inquiry to the date of such report.

So as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Vice President, under authority of Senate Resolution 206, agreed to on April 12, 1934, to investigate the munitions industry, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $50,000 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized to be expended for the purposes set forth in said resolution: Provided, That the committee is requested to report to the Senate, on or before April 1, recommendations for legislation at this session of Congress based upon the inquiry to the date of such report.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

A bill (S. 1159) granting an increase of pension to Achsah E. Purinton;

A bill (S. 1160) granting a pension to Benjamin F. Howatt; and

A bill (S. 1161) granting an increase of pension to Edward L. Hayes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 1162) to regulate the business of making small loans in the District of Columbia, and to amend an act to regulate the business of loaning money, etc., approved February 4, 1913; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 1163) to amend section 5138 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, with respect to the required capital of national banks; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPEAL OF FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX

Mr. CAPPER introduced a bill (S. 1164) to repeal section 603 of the Revenue Act of 1934, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 603 of the Revenue Act of 1934 be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, this amendment proposes to strike out the Federal tax of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline. This tax, which is generally regarded as discriminatory, unjust, and outrageous, ought to be repealed. It invades a field that should be left to the States, which already have loaded the automobile and truck owners with taxes that amount to a 25-percent annual tax on their property.

It is my thought, and I believe it also is the belief of most Members of the Senate, that gasoline taxes should be reserved for State and local taxing units, and that these should be devoted entirely to construction and maintenance purposes. A fairly heavy tax on gasoline, when the proceeds are used on the highways, can be, and is, justified. The users of the highways should pay for their construction and maintenance.

But here we have the motor-car operators and owners today paying more than a billion dollars a year in taxes to Federal, State, and local governments. This does not take into account that in most States motor vehicles are also taxed as personal property. I sincerely hope we may get rid of the unfair Federal tax at the end of the present fiscal year.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 88) making additional appropriations for the Federal Communications Commission, the National Mediation Board, and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

UNIFORM SCALE OF TRANSPORTATION RATES

Mr. RUSSELL submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 6), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Whereas it is the policy of the Congress to encourage and promote the equal development of every section of the United States, and

Whereas the existing rates of transportation in force with respect to carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, have a tendency to deter such development in certain sections of the country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that in the administration of such act it would be to the best interests of the people of the United States to have a uniform scale of transportation rates on a mileage basis which would apply equally in all sections of the United States.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 56), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized, during the Seventy-fourth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3410, being the independent offices appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3410) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Independent Establishments—American Battle Monuments Commission", on page 4, line 4, after the word "purchase", to insert a semicolon and "the purchase of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle at a cost not exceeding $2,400", so as to read:

For every expenditure requisite for or incident to the work of the American Battle Monuments Commission authorized by the act of March 4, 1923 (U. S. C., title 36, secs. 121–133), and by Executive Order No. 6614 of February 26, 1934, including the acquisition of land or interest in land in foreign countries for carrying out the purposes of said act and Executive order without submission to the Attorney General of the United States under the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 520; title 40, sec. 255); employment of personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses; rent of office space in foreign countries; the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles which may be furnished to the Commission by other departments of the Government or acquired by purchase; the purchase of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle at a cost not exceeding $2,400; printing, binding, engraving, lithographing, photographing, and typewriting, including the publication of information concerning the American activities, battlefields, memorials, and cemeteries in Europe; the purchase of maps, textbooks, newspapers, and periodicals, $199,059:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to speak on that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. If we are going to vote on this amendment, I have a right to speak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will have his right; there is no doubt about that; but the Senator from Virginia had the floor when we came to the first amendment to the bill.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether or not the Senator from Virginia desires to occupy the floor on that amendment.

Mr. GLASS. I do not care to occupy the floor for more than a minute or so to explain the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LONG. I have no objection to the Senator from Virginia doing that.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, this bill involves appropriations for some thirty-odd independent offices, meaning offices not within the jurisdiction of any Cabinet officer. The bill as it passed the House carried a total appropriation of $777,267,462. The Senate committee made but one material alteration in the bill. There was presented a situation the like of which I do not think has occurred since I became a Member of the Senate, if it ever before occurred. Although letters were dispatched to all the thirty-odd independent offices with invitations to appear before the Senate committee to propose any amendments which they might have in mind to suggest to the bill, there was a response from only one, the new Commission on Securities and Exchange. All other of the independent offices signified their acquiescence in the terms of the bill as it passed the House. No member of the committee proposed any alterations to the bill, and we venture to hope that the same concord may obtain here on the floor of the Senate.

The bill, as may be seen from the report, appropriates $115,506 less than the Budget estimates amounted to. As we proceed with the reading of the bill I shall be glad to answer any questions which may be propounded.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course, the Senator understands that the bill is not going to be read in detail. The bill is going to be read only for amendments.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; it will be read only for amendments.

Mr. COUZENS. That, of course, would not explain the increase in the appropriations over the fiscal year 1935, amounting to one-hundred-and-seventy-nine-million-one-hundred-and-ninety-nine-thousand-odd dollars. I wonder if before the Senator takes his seat he will explain briefly how these enormous increases came to be made in the independent offices bill?

Mr. GLASS. The increases are in the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. COUZENS. All of them?

Mr. GLASS. Practically altogether in the Veterans' Administration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. LONG addressed the Senate on the World Court. After having spoken for about 45 minutes, he yielded to permit the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, and for the transaction of other business, as follows:

ECONOMIC SECURITY (H. DOC. NO. 81)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In addressing you on June 8, 1934, I summarized the main objectives of our American program. Among these was, and is, the security of the men, women, and children of the Nation against certain hazards and vicissitudes of life. This purpose is an essential part of our task. In my annual message to you I promised to submit a definite program of action. This I do in the form of a report to me by a Committee on Economic Security, appointed by me for the purpose of surveying the field and of recommending the basis of legislation.

I am gratified with the work of this committee and of those who have helped it: The Technical Board of Economic Security, drawn from various departments of the Government; the Advisory Council on Economic Security, consisting of informed and public-spirited private citizens; and a number of other advisory groups, including a Committee on Actuarial Consultants, a Medical Advisory Board, a Dental Advisory Committee, a Hospital Advisory Committee, a Public Health Advisory Committee, a Child Welfare Committee, and an Advisory Committee on Employment Relief. All of those who participated in this notable task of planning this major legislative proposal are ready and willing at any time to consult with and assist in any way the appropriate congressional committees and Members with respect to detailed aspects.

It is my best judgment that this legislation should be brought forward with a minimum of delay. Federal action is necessary to and conditioned upon the actions of States. Forty-four legislatures are meeting or will meet soon. In order that the necessary State action may be taken promptly, it is important that the Federal Government proceed speedily.

The detailed report of the committee sets forth a series of proposals that will appeal to the sound sense of the American people. It has not attempted the impossible nor has it failed to exercise sound caution and consideration of all of the factors concerned: the national credit, the rights and responsibilities of States, the capacity of industry to assume financial responsibilities and the fundamental necessity of proceeding in a manner that will merit the enthusiastic support of citizens of all sorts.

It is overwhelmingly important to avoid any danger of permanently discrediting the sound and necessary policy of Federal legislation for economic security by attempting to apply it on too ambitious a scale before actual experience has provided guidance for the permanently safe direction of such efforts. The place of such a fundamental in our future civilization is too precious to be jeopardized now by extravagant action. It is a sound idea—a sound ideal. Most of the other advanced countries of the world have already adopted it, and their experience affords the knowledge that social insurance can be made a sound and workable project.

Three principles should be observed in legislation on this subject. In the first place, the system adopted, except for the money necessary to initiate it, should be self-sustaining in the sense that funds for the payment of insurance benefits should not come from the proceeds of general taxation. Second, excepting in old-age insurance, actual management should be left to the States subject to standards established by the Federal Government. Third, sound financial management of the funds and the reserves and protection of the credit structure of the Nation should be assured by retaining Federal control over all funds through trustees in the Treasury of the United States.

At this time, I recommend the following types of legislation looking to economic security:

First. Unemployment compensation.

Second. Old-age benefits, including compulsory and voluntary annuities.

Third. Federal aid to dependent children through grants to States for the support of existing mother's pension systems and for services for the protection and care of homeless, neglected, dependent, and crippled children.

Fourth. Additional Federal aid to State and local public health agencies and the strengthening of the Federal Public Health Service. I am not at this time recommending the adoption of so-called "health insurance", although groups representing the medical profession are cooperating with the Federal Government in the further study of the subject, and definite progress is being made.

With respect to unemployment compensation I have concluded that the most practical proposal is the levy of a uniform Federal pay-roll tax, 90 percent of which should be allowed as an offset to employers contributing under a compulsory State unemployment compensation act. The purpose of this is to afford a requirement of a reasonably uniform character for all States cooperating with the Federal Government and to promote and encourage the passage of unemployment compensation laws in the States. The 10 percent not thus offset should be used to cover the costs of Federal and State administration of this broad system. Thus, States will largely administer unemployment compensation, assisted and guided by the Federal Government. An unemployment compensation system should be constructed in such a way as to afford every practicable aid and incentive toward the larger purpose of employment stabilization. This can be helped by the intelligent planning of both public and private employment. It also can be helped by correlating the system with public employment so that a person who has exhausted his benefits may be eligible for some form of public work as is recommended in this report. Moreover, in order to encourage the stabilization of private employment Federal legislation should not foreclose the States from establishing means for inducing industries to afford an even greater stabilization of employment.

In the important field of security for our old people it seems necessary to adopt three principles—first, noncontributory old-age pensions for those who are now too old to build up their own insurance; it is, of course, clear that for perhaps 30 years to come funds will have to be provided by the States and the Federal Government to meet these pensions. Second, compulsory contributory annuities, which in time will establish a self-supporting system for those now young and for future generations. Third, voluntary contributory annuities by which individual initiative can increase the annual amounts received in old age. It is proposed that the Federal Government assume one-half of the cost of the old-age-pension plan, which ought ultimately to be supplanted by self-supporting annuity plans.

The amount necessary at this time for the initiation of unemployment compensation, old-age security, children's aid, and the promotion of public health, as outlined in the report of the Committee on Economic Security, is approximately $100,000,000.

The establishment of sound means toward a greater future economic security of the American people is dictated by a prudent consideration of the hazards involved in our national life. No one can guarantee this country against the dangers of future depressions, but we can reduce these dangers. We can eliminate many of the factors that cause economic depressions and we can provide the means of mitigating their results. This plan for economic security is at once a measure of prevention and a method of alleviation.

We pay now for the dreadful consequence of economic insecurity—and dearly. This plan presents a more equitable and infinitely less expensive means of meeting these costs. We cannot afford to neglect the plain duty before us. I strongly recommend action to attain the objectives sought in this report.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 17, 1935.

A summary of the report of the President's Committee on Economic Security, which report accompanied the message, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

EMPLOYMENT ASSURANCE

Since most people must live by work, the first objective in a program of economic security must be maximum employment. As the major contribution of the Federal Government in providing a safeguard against unemployment, we suggest employment assurance—the stimulation of private employment and the provision of public employment for those able-bodied workers whom industry cannot employ at a given time. Public-work programs are most necessary in periods of severe depressions, but may be needed in normal times as well to help meet the problems of stranded communities and overmanned or declining industries. To avoid the evils of hastily planned emergency work, public employment should be planned in advance and coordinated with the construction and developmental policies of the Government and with the State and local public-works projects.

We regard work as preferable to other forms of relief where possible. While we favor unemployment compensation in cash, we believe that it should be provided for limited periods on a contractual basis and without governmental subsidies. Public funds should be devoted to providing work, rather than to introduce a relief element into what should be strictly an insurance system. * * *

The resources of all public bodies—Federal, State, and local—must be coordinated if the policy of employment assurance is to be effectively realized. It would be advantageous to include in the program many types of public employment other than those which are considered necessary for the regular operations of government. This would include not only public construction of all kinds but also appropriate work to employ usefully the professional and self-employed groups of our population. It would also be desirable to extend Federal loans at low rates of interest to States and local governments for employment purposes. Such loans, once established, should be on a self-liquidating basis, and should become a revolving fund to be used over and over again as loans are repaid.

This entire program points immediately and inevitably toward practical advance planning on a broad scale to make the potential resources of a region available for the general welfare of the people involved, and toward detailed development of individual projects. To this end we endorse the recommendation of the National Resources Board for the establishment of a permanent national planning board.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Unemployment compensation, as we conceive it, is a front line of defense, especially valuable for those who are ordinarily steadily employed, but beneficial also in maintaining purchasing power in depression time. While it will not directly benefit those now unemployed until they are reabsorbed in industry, it should be instituted at the earliest possible date to increase the security of all who are employed.

We believe that the States should administer unemployment compensation, assisted by the Federal Government. We recommend as essential the imposition of a uniform pay-roll tax against which credits shall be allowed to industries (which have contributed to unemployment insurance funds) in States that shall have passed compulsory unemployment compensation laws. Through such a uniform pay-roll tax it will be possible to remove the unfair competitive advantage that employers operating in States which have failed to adopt a compensation system enjoy over employers operating in States which give such protection to their wage earners. * * *

We believe also that it is essential that the Federal Government assume responsibility for safeguarding, investing, and liquidating all reserve funds, in order that these reserves may be utilized to promote economic stability and to avoid dangers inherent in their uncontrolled investment and liquidation. We believe, further, that the Federal act should require high administrative standards, but should leave wide latitude to the States in other respects, as we deem varied experience necessary within particular provisions in unemployment compensation laws in order to conclude what types are most practicable in this country. * * *

In the basis calculations of our actuaries, a waiting period of 4 weeks, a 50-percent compensation rate and a maximum of $15 per week, but no minimum, were assumed. We suggest to the States in framing their laws that on the basis of 3-percent contribution rate the maximum benefit period cannot safely exceed 16 weeks and should be reduced to 15 weeks, if it is desired to give workers who have been long employed without drawing benefits an additional (maximum) week of compensation for each

6 months they have been employed without drawing benefits, up to a maximum of 10 additional weeks.

Extended cash benefits seem to us far less desirable than work benefits, and we recommend that an employee, after he has exhausted his contractual rights, be certified to the authorities in charge of the Federal work program as entitled to a work benefit. Such certification shall entitle the unemployed insured worker who has exhausted his cash benefits to employment on any available public employment project. * * *

The States should make all contributions compulsory and may require them from employers alone, or from employers and employees, with or without contribution by the State government. The States should have freedom in determining their own waiting periods, benefit rates, maximum benefit periods, etc. We suggest caution lest they insert in their laws benefit provisions in excess of collections. * * *

We earnestly recommend prompt enactment by the Congress of legislation which will (1) impose a uniform tax on the employers to whom the act is applicable, beginning with the year 1936, and (2) create machinery for participation in the administration of unemployment compensation.

The tax should be imposed upon all employers who have employed four or more employees for a reasonable period of time (any 13 weeks of the taxable year for example), and should be measured by a percentage of the employer's pay roll. By 1938 the rate of tax should be 3 percent of the pay roll; but in the first 2 years, if economic recovery has not progressed satisfactorily, we recommend a lower rate, and suggest that the index of industrial production of the Federal Reserve Board may well be used to determine whether the rate in the first and second years shall be 1 percent, 2 percent, or 3 percent. We are opposed to exclusions of any specified industries from the Federal act, but favor the establishment of a separate nationally administered system of unemployment compensation for railroad employees and maritime workers.

Against the tax imposed in the Federal law, a credit, up to 90 percent of the tax, should be allowed for the money the employer has paid to the proper State authority as contributions for unemployment compensation purposes pursuant to State law. These credits, however, should be permitted only if the State is cooperating with the Federal Government in the administration of unemployment compensation, expending the money raised solely for benefits, and is depositing all contributions as collected in an unemployment trust fund in the United States Treasury.

If a State, to encourage stabilization of employment, permits particular industries or companies to have individual reserve or guaranteed employment accounts (such accounts to be kept by the State authority, but with deposit of the funds in the United States Treasury) or allows lower rates of contributions to employers not having such individual accounts on the basis of their favorable experience, an additional credit beyond the amount contributed in a particular year may be granted in the Federal act. We recommend, however, that such credit be allowed in all cases only on the condition that the employer has discharged in full his obligations under the State law and continues to pay at least 1 percent into the pooled State fund. Further, such an employer with an individual reserve account before becoming entitled to any additional credit, must have and maintain a reserve equal to at least 15 percent of his pay roll, and an employer with a guaranteed employment account a reserve of 7½ percent of his pay roll; while no additional credit for any reduction in rates payable to a pooled State fund may be allowed until after the State law has been in operation for 5 years.

To encourage efficient administration, without which unemployment insurance will fail to accomplish its purpose, we believe that the Federal Government should aid the States by granting them sufficient money for proper administration, under conditions designed to insure competence and probity. Among these conditions we deem selection of personnel on a merit basis vital to success. We also recommend that as a condition, both of grants in aid for administration and of the allowance of any tax credits for payments made under any State unemployment compensation act, the State must have accepted the provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act (Public Employment Service) and provide for the payment of unemployment compensation through the public employment offices established under such act. A grant in aid for administration would not create any new burden on the Federal Government, as it would be paid for by the amount of the pay-roll tax over and above the credits allowed for contributions to State funds.

As an essential part of the Federal law, it should be made a requirement for any tax credits that all moneys collected for unemployment compensation purposes under State laws (including those credited to individual industry or company accounts) be deposited as collected in the Treasury of the United States in a trust account to the credit of the State, to be invested and liquidated as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time direct. Withdrawals from the fund are to be made only for unemployment compensation purposes, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. * * *

The plan of unemployment compensation we suggest is frankly experimental. We anticipate that it may require numerous changes with experience, and, we believe, is so set up that these changes can be made through subsequent legislation as deemed necessary. If we are to wait until everyone interested in the subject is in agreement as to what is a perfect measure before enacting unemployment compensation legislation, there will be a long and unwarranted postponement of action.

We submit that the Federal part of the program should be enacted into law by the Congress at the earliest date possible. This is urgently necessary if the State legislatures are to act in time to permit the legislation to go into effect January 1, 1936. In the coming year, 44 of the 48 States will hold regular sessions of their legislatures. Most of these will convene in January and will be in session 3 months or less Unemployment compensation in this country will suffer another year of delay unless there is prompt action by the Congress.

OLD-AGE SECURITY

To meet the problem of security for the aged we suggest as complementary measures, noncontributory old-age pensions, compulsory contributory annuities, and voluntary contributory annuities, all to be applicable on retirement at age 65 or over.

Only noncontributory old-age pensions will meet the situation of those who are now old and have no means of support. Laws for the payment of old-age pensions on a needs basis are in force in more than half of all States and should be enacted everywhere. Because most of the dependent aged are now on relief lists and derive their support principally from the Federal Government, and many of the States cannot assume the financial burden of pensions unaided, we recommend that the Federal Government pay one-half the cost of old-age pensions, but not more than $15 per month for any individual. * * *

Since the Federal Government, under the plan we recommend, is to assume one-half the cost of old-age pensions, we deem it proper that it should require State legislation and administration which will insure to all of the needy aged pensions adequate for their support. We recommend that aid be granted only to those States which enact laws that are State-wide or Territory-wide in scope, and, if administered by political subdivisions, are mandatory upon them. Such laws may limit the granting of pensions to citizens of the United States and residents of the State or Territory, but may not require a longer period of residence than 5 years, within the last 10 years preceding the application for a pension. Property and income limitations may, likewise, be prescribed but no aged person otherwise eligible may be denied a pension whose property does not exceed $5,000 in value or whose income is not larger than is necessary for a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health. The pension to be allowed must be an amount sufficient, with the other income of the pensioner, for such a reasonable subsistence. Federal grants in aid are to be paid only on account of pensions granted to persons over 65 years of age but until January 1, 1940, States may maintain a 70-year age limit, which must thereafter be reduced to 65. No Federal aid is to be extended for aged persons cared for in institutions, and so much of the total pensions paid to any pensioner as was derived from the United States Government shall constitute a lien on the estate of the aged recipient, which, upon his death shall be enforced by the State or Territory and refunded to the Federal Government. The administration of the old-age pension laws must be under the supervision of a designated State department and must be so conducted as to insure fulfillment of the intent of the Federal grants in aid; namely, to give all dependent aged persons not in need of institutional care a decent subsistence in their own homes.

COSTS

Only approximate estimates can be given regarding costs of proposed grants in aid. The estimates of actuaries consulted by this committee are in our judgment so high in estimated figures for the year 1980 that further careful studies must be given to them with the objective of finding ways and means for reduction and limitation of estimated Government contributions as of that year.

Obviously figures will be reduced if a compulsory system of contributory annuities is established simultaneously with the Federal grants in aid. Sound financing demands this simultaneous action. Furthermore, the actuarial figures assume that contributory annuities will not cover a large percentage of our population, comprising those who are not actual wage earners. It is essential that as soon as possible these persons be brought into the compulsory system of contributory annuities, else the annual Government contributions will be so high as to constitute an impossible charge on the taxpayers.

CONTRIBUTORY ANNUITIES (COMPULSORY SYSTEM)

The satisfactory way of providing for the old age of those now young is a contributory system of old-age annuities. These will enable younger workers, with matching contributions from their employers to build up a more adequate old-age protection than it is possible to achieve with pensions based upon a means test. To launch such a system we deem it necessary that workers who are now middle aged or older, and who, therefore, cannot in the few remaining years of their industrial life accumulate a substantial reserve, be, nevertheless, paid reasonably adequate annuities upon retirement. A portion of these particular annuities will come out of Government funds, but because receipts from contributions will in the early years greatly exceed annuity payments it will not be necessary as a financial problem to have Government contribution until after the system has been in operation for 30 years. The combined contributory rate we recommend is 1 percent of pay roll, to be divided equally between employers and employees, which is to be increased by 1 percent each 5 years until the maximum of 5 percent is reached in 20 years. * * *

We recommend that the contributory annuity system include, on a compulsory basis, all manual workers and nonmanual workers earning less than $250 per month, except those of governmental units and those covered by the United States Railroad Retirement

Act. (In the first 5 years that the act is in effect only employees who on the effective date are less than 60 years of age are to be included.) Employees who lose compulsory coverage (by becoming employers, ceasing to work, etc.) after they have made at least 200 weekly contributions are to be permitted to continue membership on a voluntary basis by paying a contribution equal to the combined contributions required from employers and employees.

The compulsory contributions are to be collected through a tax on pay rolls and wages, to be divided equally between the employers and employees. To keep the reserves within manageable limits, we suggest that the combined rate of employers and employees be 1 percent in the first 5 years the system is in effect, 2 percent in the second 5 years, 3 percent in the third 5 years, 4 percent in the fourth 5 years, and 5 percent thereafter. If it is deemed desirable to reduce the burden of the system upon future generations, the initial rate may well be doubled and the taking effect of each higher rate advanced by 5 years.

Both the tax on the employers and the employees is to be collected through the employers, who shall be entitled to deduct the amount paid in the employees' behalf from wages due them. The necessary rules and regulations for collection of contributions are to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

We suggest that the Federal Government make no contributions from general tax revenues to the fund during the years in which income exceeds payment from the funds, but that it guarantee to make contributions, when the level of payment exceeds income from contributions and interest, sufficient to maintain the reserve at the level of the last year in which income exceeded payments. According to our actuarial estimates the reserve on this basis would be maintained at about $15,250,000,000.

No benefits are to be paid until after the system has been in operation for 5 years, nor to any person who has not made at least 200 weekly contributions, nor before the member has reached the age of 65 and retired from gainful employment. Persons retiring after having passed age 65 will receive only the same pension as if they had retired at that age. The benefits are normally to take the form of annuities payable during the remainder of the life of the annuitant. Should a member die before the age of 65 or before the amount of his own contributions has been paid to him as an annuity, the difference between his contributions and the amount which he may have received as an annuity, with interest at 3 percent, is to be paid as a death benefit to his dependents. Members who have made contributions for a short time, but who, on reaching age 65 are not entitled to an annuity (because they have not made 200 contributions), are to be refunded their own contributions with 3-percent interest.

Under one proposal considered by the committee the annuity payable to members in whose behalf contributions are first paid during the years 1937 to 1941 shall be computed as follows: If they are eligible to retirement in the sixth year after becoming members, their annuity shall be equal to 15 percent of the average weekly wage during the period they have been within the system, not counting that portion of the wage in excess of $150 per month. For those retiring in the next 5 years this annuity is to be increased by 1 percent of the average weekly wage for each additional 40 weeks of contributions, but the increase shall not exceed 1 percent of each year of membership in the system. Thereafter the initial annuity is to be increased by 2 percent for each 40 weekly contributions, but not more than 2 percent per year, until a maximum pension of 40 percent of the first $150 average monthy wages upon which contributions have been paid shall be reached.

The minimum annuity payable to persons in whose behalf contributions are first paid in 1942 or subsequent thereto shall, on retirement at age 65 or over, after 200 weekly contributions, be 10 percent of the first $150 average monthly wages upon which contributions have been paid. To this 10 percent shall be added 1 percent for each 40 weekly contributions subsequent to the first 200 payments made within the first 5 years of membership in the system, but not to exceed 1 percent for each year of membership after the qualifying period of 5 years. * * *

VOLUNTARY OLD-AGE ANNUITIES

The voluntary system of old-age annuities we suggest, as a supplement to the compulsory plan that contemplates the Government shall sell to individuals, on a cost basis, deferred life annuities similar to those issued by commercial insurance companies; that is, in consideration of premiums paid at specified ages the Government would guarantee the purchasers a definite amount of income, starting at 65, for example, and continuing throughout the lifetime of the annuitant. The primary purpose of the plan is to offer persons not included within the compulsory system a systematic and safe method of providing for their old age. It could also be used by insured persons as a means of supplementing the old-age income provided under the compulsory plan. * * *

The plan should be designed primarily for the same income groups as those covered by compulsory system, hence, provision should be made for the acceptance of relatively small premiums (as little as $1 per month) and the maximum annuity payable to any individual should be limited to the actuarial equivalent of $50 per month. * * *

There should be a study of the feasibility of Government contributions toward the annuities of people now middle-aged or older with income of $2,500 per year or less who come under this voluntary plan, comparable to the unearned part of the annuities which will be paid by the Government to people of middle age or older who are brought under the compulsory system. This is but a fair deal to farm owners and tenants, self-employed persons, and other people of small incomes whose economic situation may be not one whit better than that of many workers covered by the compulsory system. Further study will be necessary, however, before a practical method of accomplishing this purpose can be suggested, one which will avoid the danger of benefiting those persons who need assistance least.

SECURITY FOR CHILDREN

A large group of the children at present maintained by relief will not be aided by employment or unemployment compensation. There are the fatherless and other young families without a breadwinner. To meet the problems of the children in these families no less than 45 States have enacted children's aid laws, generally called "mothers' pension laws." However, due to the present financial difficulty in which many States find themselves, far more of such children are on the relief lists than are in receipt of children's aid benefits. We are strongly of the opinion that these families should be differentiated from the permanent dependents and unemployables, and we believe that the children's aid plan is the method which will best care for their needs. We recommend Federal grants-in-aid on the basis of one-half the State and local expenditures for this purpose (one-third the entire cost). * * *

Such Federal grants-in-aid are a new departure, but it is imperative to give them if the mother's care method of rearing fatherless families is to become nationally operative. The amount of money required is less than the amount now given to families of this character by the Federal Government by the less desirable route of emergency relief. An initial appropriation of approximately $25,000,000 per year is believed to be sufficient. If the principle is adopted of making grants to one-half of the State and local expenditures (one-third the total cost), with special assistance to States temporarily incapacitated, this sum might in time rise to a possible $50,000,000. Federal grants should be made conditional on passage and enforcement of mandatory State laws and on the submission of approved plans assuring minimum standards in investigation, amounts of grants and administration. After a specified date, State financial participation should be insisted upon. This might take the form either of equalization grants to local units or of per capita grants, as the several States may prefer. * * *

We recommend also that the Federal Government give assistance to States in providing local services for the protection and care of homeless, neglected, and delinquent children and for child and maternal health services, especially in rural areas. Special aid should be given toward meeting a part of the expenditures for transportation, hospitalization, and convalescent care of crippled and handicapped children in order that those very necessary services may be extended for a large group of children whose only handicaps are physical. * * *

RISKS ARISING OUT OF ILL HEALTH

As a first measure for meeting the very serious problem of sickness in families with low income we recommend a Nation-wide preventive public-health program. It should be largely financed by State and local governments and administered by State and local health departments, the Federal Government to contribute financial and technical aid. The program contemplates (1) grants-in-aid to be allocated through State departments of health to local areas unable to finance public-health programs from State and local resources; (2) direct aid to States in the development of State health services and the training of personnel for State and local health work; and (3) additional personnel in the United States Public Health Service to investigate health problems of interstate or national concern.

The second major step, we believe, to be the application of the principles of insurance to this problem. We are not prepared at this time to make recommendations for a system of health insurance. We have enlisted the cooperation of advisory groups representing the medical and dental professions and hospital management in the development of a plan for health insurance which will be beneficial alike to the public and the professions concerned. We have asked these groups to complete their work by March 1, 1935, and expect to make a further report on this subject at that time or shortly thereafter.

RESIDUAL RELIEF

The measures we suggest all seek to segregate clearly distinguishable large groups among those now on relief or on the verge of relief and to apply such differentiated treatment to each group as will give it the greatest practical degree of economic security. We believe that if these measures are adopted, the residual relief problem will have diminished to a point where it will be possible to return primary responsibility for the care of people who cannot work to the State and local governments.

To prevent such a step from resulting in less humane and less intelligent treatment of these unfortunate fellow citizens, we strongly recommend that the States substitute for their ancient, out-mided poor laws modernized public-assistance laws, and replace their traditional poor laws administrations by unified and efficient State and local public-welfare departments, such as exist in some States and for which there is a nucleus in all States in the Federal Emergency Relief Organization.

ADMINISTRATION

The creation of a social insurance board within the Department of Labor, to be appointed by the President and with terms to insure continuity of administration, is recommended to administer the Federal Unemployment Compensation Act, and the system of Federal contributory old-age annuities.

The Secretary of the Treasury is recommended to have full responsibility for the safeguarding and investment of all social insurance funds. The Federal Emergency Relief Administration is recommended as the most appropriate existing agency for the administration of noncontributing old-age pensions and grants-in-aid for dependent children. If this agency should be abolished the President should designate the distribution of its work.

It is recommended that all activities of the Federal Government dealing with the administration of laws based on those recommendations be coordinated and systematized.

The members of the President's Committee on Economic Security signing the report were the Secretary of Labor, chairman; the Secretary of the Treasury; the Attorney General; the Secretary of Agriculture; the Federal Emergency Relief Administrator.

Mr. WAGNER. At this time I introduce a bill to carry out the recommendations made by the President and also the President's Committee on Economic Security. The bill has been drafted under my supervision and it also includes my own views. Because of the general interest in this proposed legislation, and the demand there will be for copies of the bill, I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1130) to alleviate the hazards of old age, unemployment, illness, and dependency, to establish a Social Insurance Board in the Department of Labor, to raise revenue, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I

APPROPRIATION FOR OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

SECTION 1. For the purposes of this title, there is hereby appropriated, from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter the sum of $125,000,000, of which sums 99½ percent shall be apportioned among the several States as hereinafter provided.

ALLOTMENTS TO STATES FOR OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

SEC. 2. The Federal Emergency Relief Administrator (hereinafter called the "Administrator"), as soon as possible after the commencement of each fiscal year, shall make allotments, in amounts as provided in section 6 of this act, to each State which, through a State old-age authority, has submitted and had approved by the Administrator a State plan for old-age assistance, and which, through its legislature, has accepted the provisions of this title: Provided, That such acceptance may be made, when such legislature is not in session, by the Governor of such State, to be effective until the close of the next session of such legislature thereafter.

DEFINITION OF OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

SEC. 3. As used in this title, "old-age assistance" shall mean financial assistance assuring a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health to persons not less than 65 years of age who, at the time of receiving such financial assistance, are not inmates of public or other charitable institutions.

APPROVAL OF STATE OLD-AGE PLANS

SEC. 4. A State plan for old-age assistance, offered by the State authority for approval, shall be approved by the Administrator only if such plan—

(a) Is State-wide, includes substantial financial participation by the State, and, if administered by subdivisions of the State, is mandatory upon such subdivisions; and

(b) Establishes or designates a single State authority to administer or supervise the administration of the plan and insures methods of administration which are approved by the Administrator; and

(c) Grants to any person whose claim for assistance is denied the right to appeal to such State authority; and

(d) Provides that such State authority shall make full and complete reports to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Administrator; and

(e) Furnishes assistance at least great enough to provide, when added to the income of the aged recipient, a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health; and, whether or not it denies assistance to any aged persons, at least does not deny assistance to any person who

(1) Is a United States citizen; and

(2) Has resided in the State for 5 years or more within the 10 years immediately preceding application for assistance; and

(3) Has an income which when joined with the income of such person's spouse, is inadequate to provide a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health; and

(4) Is 65 years of age or older: Provided, That until January 1, 1940, but not thereafter, assistance may be denied to otherwise eligible persons who are less than 70 years of age; and

(f) Provides that so much of the sum paid as assistance to any aged recipient as represents the share of the United States Government in such assistance shall be a lien on the estate of the aged recipient which, upon his death, shall be enforced by the State, and that the net amount realized by the enforcement of such lien shall be deemed to be part of the State's allotment from the United States Government for the year in which such lien was enforced: Provided, That no such lien shall be enforced against any real estate of the recipient while it is occupied by the recipient's surviving spouse, if the latter is not more than 15 years younger than the recipient, and does not marry again.

REPORTS BY STATES

SEC. 5. To obtain the benefits of this title, a State old-age authority shall submit to the Administrator at such time and upon such forms as he may prescribe—

(a) An annual statement of the amount of the appropriation made by the State for its current or ensuing fiscal year for the purpose of carrying out the State plan, stating how much of such appropriation is for the actual payments of old-age assistance and how much for the payment of the expenses of administration; and

(b) An annual estimate of the sum which must be contributed by the political subdivisions of the State during such year for the purpose of carrying out the State plan, estimating how much of the sum is for payment of such old-age assistance and how much for the payment of the expenses of administration; and as soon as possible thereafter, a statement of the exact sums thus contributed; and

(c) At least once in every 3 months, a statement of the amount, actually paid, as old-age assistance, to each person 65 years of age or over, and the amount actually expended for the purpose of administration; and

(d) An annual statement of the amount collected, if any, from the estate of any assisted aged person, for which the State is accountable to the United States under section 4 (f) of this act.

(e) An annual statement of the exact amount, if any, of an allotment made under this title to such State remaining unexpended at the close of the year for which such allotment was made.

AMOUNT OF ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

SEC. 6. (a) The Administrator shall compute annually the amount to be allotted to such State at the sum of (a) and (b) of section 5 of this act, after deducting therefrom the sum of (d) and (e) of such section. In computing the allotment for administration, only so much of the appropriations and/or contributions for that purpose by the State and its political subdivisions shall be taken as a basis of computation which does not exceed 5 percent of the appropriations for old-age assistance.

(b) The Administrator shall direct that the amount of an allotment shall be changed when, under section 5 (b), a definite statement shows that the sums actually required to be contributed differ from the estimated amount, and the change in the allotment shall be in relation to the variation between the estimate and the actual requirement.

(c) If the sum of all allotments be in excess of the appropriations for the purpose, then the allotment to each State shall be diminished to that percentage which the appropriations bear to the sum of all allotments.

(d) Any unexpended amount of any allotment to a State at the end of the year for which such allotment was made shall be available to the State for the ensuing year.

(e) The Administrator may withdraw his approval of a State plan, if after his approval thereof such plan fails to comply with the conditions specified in section 3 of this act. In case of such withdrawal of approval, the Administrator shall notify the State authority of his action and the reasons therefor, and shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold payments to such State.

PAYMENT OF INSTALLMENTS

SEC. 7. The Administrator shall annually notify the Secretary of the Treasury and the treasurers of the several States of the allotments made under this title, and shall periodically notify the Secretary of the Treasury of the amounts payable as quarterly installments to the treasurers of the several States. The Secretary of the Treasury, after receiving such notice, shall pay such quarterly installments to the treasurer of each such State from the sums allotted to it, unless the Administrator notifies him to withhold payment of any installment, or to change the amount of any allotment, in which case he shall act in accordance with such notification: Provided, That no such installment shall exceed one-half of the amounts expended in such State, in the quarter immediately preceding the payment of such installment for the payment of old-age assistance, nor shall it exceed $15 a month per person, and for the administration of the State plan, up to 5 percent of the total amount expended under such plan in such quarter.

ACTION OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

SEC. 8. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to allow credits in the accounts of the Treasury of the United States for payment of allotments in the amounts notified him by the Administrator.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 9. From the moneys becoming available under or in accordance with this title not more than one-half of 1 percent may be expended by the Administrator for all necessary expenditures, including the employment of experts, assistants, clerks, and other persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, the purchase of supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures and apparatus, and the incurring of travel and other expenses, as the Administrator may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title. The Administrator shall include in his annual report to Congress a full account of the administration of this title and expenditure of the moneys herein appropriated or authorized. The President is authorized to transfer at any time to any officer or agency of the Government, the duties and powers conferred upon the Administrator under this title.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 10. The Administrator is authorized to make all rules and regulations necessary to effectuate the purposes of this title.

INCLUSION OF TERRITORIES AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SEC. 11. As used in this title, the term "State" includes Hawaii, Alaska, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

TITLE II

APPROPRIATIONS FOR AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

SECTION 201. For the purposes of this title, there is hereby appropriated, from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and the sum of $25,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter, not more than 99½ percent of such sums to be apportioned among the several States as hereinafter provided.

ALLOTMENTS TO STATES FOR AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

SEC. 202. The Administrator shall, as soon as possible after the commencement of each fiscal year, make allotments, in amounts as provided in section 206 of this act, to each State which, through a State authority, has submitted and had approved by him a State plan for aid to dependent children, and which, through its legislature, has accepted the provisions of this title: Provided, That such acceptance may be made, when such legislature is not in session, by the Governor of such State, to be effective until the close of the next session of such legislature thereafter.

DEFINITION OF DEPENDENT CHILDREN

SEC. 203. As used in this title, "dependent children" shall mean children under the age of 16 in their own homes, in which there is no adult person, other than one needed to care for the child or children, who is able to work and provide the family with a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health.

APPROVAL OF STATE PLANS FOR AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

SEC. 204. A State plan for aid to dependent children, offered by a State authority for approval, shall be approved by the Administrator only if such plan—

(a) Provides that not later than June 30, 1936, and thereafter, aid to dependent children shall be available, to persons in need of the same, in every political subdivision of the State, and that the State shall make substantial contributions to the payment thereof; and

(b) Provides that such State authority shall make full and complete reports to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Administrator; and

(c) Furnishes assistance at least great enough to provide, when added to the income of the family, a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health; and

(d) Establishes or designates a single State agency to administer or supervise the administration of the plan and insures methods of administration and payment which are approved by the Administrator; and

(e) Does not impose a residence requirement, as a condition precedent to the granting of such aid, of longer than 1 year.

REPORTS BY STATES

SEC. 205. To obtain the benefits of this title a State authority shall submit to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration at such time and on such forms as the Administrator may prescribe—

(a) An annual statement of the amount of the appropriation made by the State for its current or ensuing fiscal year, and the amount made available for such year by the political subdivisions of such State, for the purpose of carrying out the State plan for aid to dependent children; and

(b) At least once in every 3 months, a statement of the amount actually expended for such purpose; and

(c) An annual statement of the exact amount, if any, of any allotment made under this title to such State remaining unexpended at the close of the year for which such allotment was made; and

(d) An annual statement of the number of dependent children whose mothers are receiving aid or are on the waiting list therefor under the State plan for aid to dependent children.

AMOUNT OF ALLOTMENTS TO STATES

SEC. 206. (a) The Administrator shall compute annually the amount to be allotted to such State at a sum equal to one-third of the amount reported under section 204 (a). If the sum of all allotments under this paragraph be in excess of the appropriations for the purpose, then the allotment to each State shall be diminished to that percentage which the appropriations bear to the sum of all such allotments.

(b) The Administrator shall allot, in each fiscal year, so much of the amounts made available under this title for the preceding fiscal year as were not required for the purposes of paragraph (a) of this section, to any or all States with approved plans for aid to dependent children, in amounts apportioned by him on a basis of need, taking into account, among other things, the numbers reported under section 205 (d) of this act.

(c) Any unexpected amount of any allotment to a State at the end of the year for which such allotment was made shall be available to the State for the ensuing year.

(d) The Administrator may withdraw his approval of a State plan for aid to dependent children, if after his approval thereof such plan fails to comply with the conditions specified in section 204 of this act. In case of such withdrawal of approval, he shall notify the State authority of his action and the reasons therefor, and shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold payments to such State.

PAYMENT OF INSTALLMENTS

SEC. 207. The Administrator shall annually notify the Secretary of the Treasury and the treasurers of the several States of the allotments made under this title, and shall periodically notify the Secretary of the Treasury of the amount payable, as a quarterly installment, to the treasurer of each State. The Secretary of the Treasury, after receiving such notice, shall pay such quarterly installment to the treasurer of each such State from the sums allotted to it, unless the Administrator notifies him to withhold payment of any installment, or to change the amount of any allotment, in which case he shall act in accordance with such notification: Provided, That no such installment shall exceed the amounts expended by such State in the quarter immediately preceding the payment of such installment for the purpose of carrying out the State plan for aid to dependent children.

ACTION OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

SEC. 208. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the Treasury of the United States for payment of allotments in the amount notified him by the Administrator.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 209. From the moneys becoming available under and/or in accordance with this title, not more than one-half of 1 percent may be expended by the Administrator for all necessary expenditures, including the employment of experts, assistants, clerks, and other persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, the purchase of supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures and apparatus, and in the incurring of traveling and other expenses as the Administrator may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this title. The Administrator shall include in his annual report to Congress a full account of the administration of this title and expenditures of the money herein authorized. The President is authorized to transfer at any time, to any officer or agency of the Government, the duties and powers conferred upon the Administrator under this title.

INCLUSION OF TERRITORIES

SEC. 210. As used in this title, the term "State" includes Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 211. The Administrator is authorized to make all rules and regulations necessary to effectuate the purposes of this title.

TITLE III

EARNINGS TAX

SECTION 301. Commencing on January 1, 1937, there shall be levied and assessed upon every employee as defined in this title an earnings tax, to be collected from and paid by every employer subject to this title:

(1) As of January 1, 1937, the tax shall be at the rate of one-half of 1 percent of the wages paid by such employer to such employee.

(2) As of January 1, 1942, the tax shall be at the rate of 1 percent of the wages paid by such employer to such employee.

(3) As of January 1, 1947, the tax shall be at the rate of 1½ percent of the wages paid by such employer to such employee.

(4) As of January 1, 1952, the tax shall be at the rate of 2 percent of the wages paid by such employer to such employee.

(5) As of January 1, 1957, the tax shall be at the rate of 2½ percent of the wages paid by such employer to such employee.

The amount of such tax (but not part of the tax levied under section 302) shall be deducted by the employer from the wages of the employee.

EMPLOYMENT OF EXCISE TAX

SEC. 302. Commencing on January 1, 1937, there shall be levied and assessed upon every employer as defined in this title an employment excise tax, to be collected from and paid by every such employer:

(1) As of January 1, 1937, the tax shall be at the rate of one-half of 1 percent of the pay roll of such employer.

(2) As of January 1, 1942, the tax shall be at the rate of 1 percent of the pay roll of such employer.

(3) As of January 1, 1947, the tax shall be at the rate of 1½ percent of the pay roll of such employer.

(4) As of January 1, 1952, the tax shall be at the rate of 2 percent of the pay roll of such employer.

(5) As of January 1, 1957, the tax shall be at the rate of 2½ percent of the pay roll of such employer.

COLLECTION OF TAXES

SEC. 303. (a) The taxes provided for in this title shall be collected by the Bureau of Internal Revenue under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such taxes shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

(b) All provisions of law, including penalties, applicable with respect to any tax imposed by section 600 or section 800 of the Revenue Act of 1926, shall, insofar as applicable and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title, be applicable in regard to the taxes imposed by this title.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 304. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this title, and in particular for—

(a) Collection and payment of the tax by stamps, coupons, tickets, books, or such other reasonable device or method as may be necessary or helpful in securing a complete and proper collection of the tax and for regulating the manner, times, and conditions in, at, and under which the tax shall be collected and paid, including the making and filing of returns and the affixing or other use of said stamps, tickets, books, or other device or devices; and

(b) Issue, sale, custody, production, cancelation, and disposition of such stamps, tickets, books, or other device or devices, including the substitution or replacement thereof in case of loss, destruction, or defacement.

SALE OF STAMPS BY POSTMASTERS

SEC. 305. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall furnish to the Postmaster General without prepayment a suitable quantity of adhesive stamps, issued or used for the collection of any tax imposed by this title, to be distributed to, and kept on sale by, the various postmasters in the United States. The Postmaster General may require each such postmaster to give additional or increased bond as postmaster for the value of the stamps so furnished, and each such postmaster shall deposit the receipts from the sale of such stamps to the credit of and render accounts to the Postmaster General at such times and in such form as he may by regulations prescribe. The Postmaster General shall at least once monthly transfer all collections from this source to the Treasury as internal-revenue collections.

PENALTIES

SEC. 306. (a) Except as provided in this title or in regulations made pursuant thereto, every person who buys, sells, offers for sale, transfers, takes, or gives in exchange, or pledges or gives in pledge any stamp, coupon, ticket, book, or other device prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the collection of any tax imposed by this title, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or sentenced to not more than 6 months' imprisonment, or both.

(b) Any person who, with intent to defraud, alters, forges, makes, or counterfeits any stamp, coupon, ticket, book, or other device prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the collection of any tax imposed by this title, or who uses, sells, lends, or has in his possession any such altered, forged, or counterfeited stamp, coupon, ticket, book, or other device, or who makes, uses, sells, or has in his possession any material in imitation of the material used in the manufacture of such stamp, coupon, ticket, book, or other device, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or both.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 307. When used in this title—

(1) The term "person" means an individual, a trust or estate, a partnership, syndicate, group, pool, joint venture, or other unincorporated organization, or a corporation, association, joint-stock company, or insurance company.

(2) The term "domestic", when applied to a corporation or partnership, means created or organized in the United States or under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory.

(3) The term "foreign", when applied to a corporation or partnership, means a corporation or partnership which is not domestic.

(4) The term "employer" shall include every person who employs an employee, as defined in this title, except that it shall not include the Federal Government, the States or any political subdivision thereof, a governmental instrumentality, or any employer subject to the Railway Retirement Act, including any amendments hereafter made to such act.

(5) The term "employee" shall include every individual who on January 1, 1937, has not attained the age of 60 years, and who receives wages under any contract of employment or hire, oral or written, express or implied, and the greater part of whose duties under such contract is performed within the continental United States or on board a vessel subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

(6) The term "wages" shall mean the total of every form of remuneration received by an employee from an employer, whether paid directly or indirectly by an employer, including salaries, commissions, bonuses, and the reasonable money value of rent, housing, lodging, board (except in the case of board, the total money value shall not be included unless such total value is in excess of $10 for any calendar month), payments in kind, and similar advantages; but it shall not include any such remuneration received by a nonmanual worker who is employed at a monthly salary of more than $250 a month.

(7) The term "pay roll" means the total amount of all wages paid by an employer subject to this title.

(8) The term "continental United States" means the several States and the District of Columbia, and excludes territories and possessions of the United States.

TITLE IV

SOCIAL INSURANCE BOARD

SECTION 401 (a). There is hereby established in the Department of Labor a Social Insurance Board (hereinafter referred to as the "board") to be composed of three members to be appointed by the President. During his term of membership on the board no member shall engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. Each member shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 a year and shall hold office for a term of 6 years, except that (1) any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term; and (2) the terms of office of the members first taking office after the date of enactment of this title shall expire, as designated by the President at the time of appointment, 1 at the end of 2 years, 1 at the end of 4 years, and 1 at the end of 6 years after the date of enactment of this title. The President shall designate the chairman of the Board.

(b) The board is authorized, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Labor, to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers, attorneys, and experts as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and, subject to the civil-service laws, to appoint such other officers and employees as are necessary in the execution of its functions and fix their salaries in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

DUTIES OF SOCIAL INSURANCE BOARD

SEC. 402. The Social Insurance Board shall have, among its duties, the duties of—

(a) Studying and making recommendations as to the most effective methods of providing economic security through social insurance, and as to legislation and matters of administrative policy concerning old-age insurance, unemployment compensation, accident compensation, health insurance, and related subjects.

(b) Examining and making recommendations to the Secretary of Labor as to the allowance of credit under title VI of this act;

(c) Supervising and directing, as hereinafter provided, the payment of old-age annuities under a national contributory old-age insurance system;

(d) Issuing old-age annuities, as provided in title V of this act;

(e) Assisting the States, in the manner hereinafter provided, in the administration of unemployment-compensation laws.

APPROPRIATION

SEC. 403. For the purposes of this title there is hereby appropriated from the funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated (a) for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, the sum of $5,000,000, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter the sum of $50,000,000, of which sums 98 percent shall be apportioned by the board among the States as hereinafter provided; and (b) the proceeds derived from all taxes imposed under title III of this act, to be allocated to the old-age fund established under this title.

SEC. 404. (a) There is hereby established in the Treasury a fund to be known as the "old-age fund", to be held and invested under the same terms and conditions as the unemployment trust fund established under title VI of this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed so to manage such fund.

(b) The Social Insurance Board shall, from time to time, requisition from such fund the amounts necessary for the making of all payments under section 405 of this act, and shall annually cause to be made, and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury in the form of a formal instrument, actuarial valuations of the future income and future expenditures of the old-age fund, which shall show the future obligations of the Government under this title.

PAYMENT OF OLD-AGE ANNUITIES

SEC. 405. (a) On and after January 1, 1942, the board shall requisition from the old-age fund and cause to be paid, to qualified aged persons, old-age annuities out of the sums appropriated under subsection (b) of section 403 of this act. No person shall receive such old-age annuity unless—

(1) At the time when it is paid to him he is not less than 65 years of age; and

(2) Taxes were paid on his behalf, under section 301 of this act, prior to the day when he attained the age of 60 years; and

(3) Taxes were paid on his behalf, under section 301 of this act, for at least 200 different weeks in not less than a 5-year period entirely prior to his attaining the age of 65 years; and

(4) He is not employed by another in a gainful occupation.

(b) Any person qualified to receive an old-age annuity shall, upon complying with all rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor and reasonably designed to facilitate the just and prompt payment of such annuities, be entitled to receive once in each month, commencing not earlier than January 1, 1942, a monthly installment of such annuity in the amount and under the conditions hereinafter prescribed, as follows:

(1) A person on whose behalf taxes were paid under section 301 of this act prior to January 1, 1942, and prior to such person attaining the age of 65 years, shall receive as his monthly installment an amount equal to a percentage of his average monthly wage. If taxes were paid on his behalf

(A) In 200 different weeks (in not less than 5 years), such percentages shall be 15 percent of such wage;

(B) For each 40 different weeks (prior to his attaining the age of 65 years) over such 200 weeks, up to an additional 200 weeks, there shall be added to such percentage 1 percent, except that such addition shall not exceed 1 percent for the 12-month period commencing at the end of the original 200 weeks or the original 5-year period, whichever ends later, and for each 12-month period thereafter;

(C) For each 40 different weeks (prior to his attaining the age of 65 years) over such aggregate of 400 weeks, up to an additional 400 weeks, there shall be a further addition of 2 percent, except that such addition shall not exceed 2 percent for the 12-month period commencing at the end of the additional 200 weeks or the fifth of the 12-month period under (B), whichever ends later, and for each 12-month period thereafter. If in the 5 years under (A) such taxes were paid in more than 200 weeks, such excess weeks over 200 shall be counted toward the additional 200 weeks under (B); and if in the five 12-month periods under (B) such taxes were or are counted as having been paid in more than 200 weeks, such excess weeks over 200 shall be counted toward the additional 400 weeks under (C).

(2) A person on whose behalf such taxes were paid only after January 1, 1942, shall receive as his monthly installment an amount equal to 10 percent of his average monthly wage plus 1 percent of such wage for each 40 different weeks (prior to his attaining the age of 65 years) over the original 200 (in not less than a 5-year period) in which such taxes were paid, except that such addition shall not exceed 1 percent for the 12-month period commencing at the end of the original 200 weeks or the original 5-year period, whichever ends later, and for each 12-month period thereafter. If in the original 5-year period such taxes were paid in more than 200 weeks, taxes paid in such excess weeks over 200 shall be deemed to have been paid in a subsequent 12-month period.

(3) Any person entitled to the payment of any installment under either paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection may, if such person has a dependent spouse, elect to receive a joint survivorship annuity of identical actuarial value in lieu of the annuity provided under either of such paragraphs, under such rules and regulations as the Social Insurance Board shall prescribe.

(4) In no event shall the actuarial value of an annuity paid to a person under this section be less than the amount paid in taxes on his behalf together with interest accretions as determined by the Social Insurance Board.

(5) As used in this section "average monthly wage" shall mean the total amount of wages upon which taxes were paid under section 301 of this act on behalf of the employee and prior to his attaining the age of 65 years, such amount to be divided by the number of months in which such taxes were paid, except that such average monthly wage shall not exceed $150. For the purpose of calculating the average monthly wage, the Social Insurance Board shall adjust the various lengths of the periods for which wages were paid to a monthly basis.

(c) If any person on whose behalf taxes have been paid under section 301 of this act dies before receiving any benefits, or before receiving in benefits an amount equal to the total amount of such taxes paid on his behalf, with interest accretions prior to the date of first receiving an annuity as determined by the Social Insurance Board, there shall be paid to his legal and/or actual dependents an amount equal to the difference between such amount of taxes together with such interest accretions and the benefits he has received.

(d) Any person upon whose behalf taxes were paid under section 301 of this act, who upon reaching the age of 65 is not entitled to benefits, may thereafter claim from the Social Insurance Board an amount equal to the amount of such tax payments, and the Social Insurance Board shall pay him such amount, together with interest accretions as determined by such board. No person who thus claims and receives any amount under this section shall thereafter be entitled to an old-age annuity or any installment thereof.

ALLOTMENTS TO STATES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 406. The board shall periodically make allotments, in a total amount of not more than $4,000,000 in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and thereafter not more than $49,000,000 in each year, to those States which have unemployment-compensation laws requiring contributions for which credits against tax are allowed under title VI of this act. The total amount, or so much thereof as the board deems necessary, allocated under this section shall be apportioned among such States on the basis of need for such financial assistance in the proper administration of such laws.

CONDITIONS OF UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ADMINISTRATION ALLOTMENTS

SEC. 407. (a) No allotment shall be made or installment paid to a State, under section 406 of this act, unless and until the board has made a finding of fact and has certified the same to the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of the Treasury, that—

(1) All positions in the administration of the unemployment-compensation law of such State are filled by persons appointed on a nonpartisan basis, and selected on the basis of merit under rules and regulations prescribed or approved by the board; and

(2) Administrative regulations and practices are reasonably calculated to insure full payment of unemployment compensation when due; and

(3) Unemployment compensation is paid as a matter of right and in accordance with the terms of the State unemployment-compensation law to all persons eligible thereto under such law, and that all persons whose claims for compensation are denied are given a fair hearing, before an impartial tribunal; and

(4) All such unemployment compensation is paid through public employment offices of the State; and

(5) All of the money raised by contributions of employers and employees under such State law is deposited upon collection to become a part of the unemployment trust fund established under title VI of this act, and, upon being requisitioned, is expended solely in the payment of unemployment compensation; and

(6) The State agency charged with the administration of the unemployment-compensation law makes, upon request, full and complete reports to the Social Insurance Board relating to the effect and administration of such law, on forms to be prescribed by the board, and makes available upon request to any agency of the United States charged with the administration of public works or other assistance through public employment, the names and addresses and ordinary occupation of each recipient of unemployment compensation and the date when such recipient received the last regular payment of compensation to which he was entitled under the State law.

(b) Payment of any installment to a State to which an allotment has been made shall be withheld if the board reverses the previous finding made by it under this section, and notifies the Secretary of the Treasury and the treasurer of the affected State of such reversal and the reason or reasons therefor. The amounts thus withheld in any fiscal year shall be added to the total amount from which allotments are made in the next fiscal year.

NOTIFICATION

SEC. 408. The board shall, as soon as possible after the commencement of the fiscal year, notify the Secretary of the Treasury, and the treasurers of the several States of the States to which allotments for that fiscal year have been made under this title, and of the sums allotted. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon pay in monthly installments to the treasurer of each such State the sums allotted to it, unless the board notifies him to withhold payment of any installment or to change the amount of any allotment, in which case he shall act in accordance with such notification.

ACTION OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

SEC. 409. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the Treasury of the United States for payment of allotments in the amount notified him by the Board.

TITLE V

ANNUITY CERTIFICATES

SECTION 501. The Social Insurance Board is authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, for the purpose of increasing the old-age fund established under this act, such sum or sums as in its judgment may be desirable, and to issue therefor, at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as it may determine, annuity certificates: Provided, That no such certificate shall be issued except to United States citizens: And provided further, That there shall not be issued to an individual a certificate or certificates for loans which would amount, with interest accretions, to more than an annuity of $100 a month after such individual attained the age of 65 years.

FORM AND CONDITIONS OF CERTIFICATES

SEC. 502. Each annuity certificate issued under this title shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions, and may bear such interest and have such provisions for payment, as the Social Insurance Board may prescribe: Provided, That payment of interest may be deferred and payment of principal and interest to persons to whom such certificates have been issued may be made in monthly installments.

ISSUANCE OF STAMPS

SEC. 503. The board may, under such regulations and upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, issue, or cause to be issued, stamps to evidence payments for, or on account of, such certificates.

DEPOSITS IN OLD-AGE FUND

SEC. 504. All moneys borrowed under this title shall be deposited by the board in the old-age fund established under section 404 of this act, to be held and used by the Secretary of the Treasury as part of such fund. The board shall requisition from such fund from time to time all amounts needed to meet promptly all obligations of the United States arising out of annuity certificates.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

SEC. 505. The Social Insurance Board shall make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

TITLE VI

IMPOSITION OF TAX

SECTION 601. There shall be levied, assessed, and collected annually from every employer subject to this title for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1936, and for each taxable year thereafter an excise tax, measured by an amount equal to 3 percent of such employer's pay roll: Provided, That—

(a) If the Federal Reserve Board's adjusted index of total industrial production averages, for the year ending September 30, 1935, not more than 84 percent of its average for the years 1923–25, inclusive, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board shall certify that fact to the Secretary of the Treasury and to Congress, and the tax imposed under this section shall, for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1936, be measured by an amount equal to 1 percent of such employer's pay roll;

(b) If such index averages, for such year, more than 84 percent but less than 95 percent of such earlier average, such fact shall be so certified, and the tax imposed under this section shall, for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1936, be measured by an amount equal to 2 percent of such employer's pay roll;

(c) If such index averages, for the year ending September 30, 1936, not more than 84 percent of such earlier average, such fact shall be so certified, and the tax imposed under this section shall, for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1937, be measured by an amount equal to 1 percent of such employer's pay roll, except that in no event shall the measure of tax for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1937, be less than the measure of tax for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1936;

(d) If such index averages, for the year ending September 30, 1936, more than 84 percent but less than 95 percent of such earlier average, such fact shall be so certified, and the tax imposed under this section shall for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1937, be measured by an amount equal to 2 percent of such employer's pay roll, except that in no event shall the measure of tax for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1937, be less than the measure of tax for the taxable year commencing January 1, 1936.

ALLOWABLE CREDIT

SEC. 602. Any employer may credit against the tax thus due, up to 90 percent of the tax, the amount of his contributions for the taxable quarter to any unemployment fund under any State law: Provided, That the Secretary of Labor has, in the month of December in the taxable year, made a finding of fact and certified to the Secretary of the Treasury that—

(a) The State by whose law such contributions were required has accepted the provisions of the act of June 6, 1933 (U. S. C., title 29, sec. 49 (c); 48 Stat. 113);

(b) Payment of all compensation is made and/or is to be made through the public employment offices in such State, and commences under such State law 2 years after contributions are first made under such law;

(c) The State agency of such State, to safeguard the money paid as contributions and to assist in maintaining the stability of industry and employment, deposits all such money, or causes it to be deposited, immediately upon its being paid as contributions, in the unemployment trust fund, or in a bank or banks designated as agents of such trust fund to be held as part of such trust fund, in accordance with section 604 of this act;

(d) None of the money requisitioned by such State agency, in accordance with section 604 of this act, has been used for any purpose except the payment of compensation;

(e) Compensation is not denied in such State to otherwise eligible employees for refusing to accept new work under any of the following conditions: (1) If the position offered is vacant due directly to a strike, lockout, or other labor disputes; (2) if the wages, hours, and other conditions of the work offered are substantially less favorable to the employee than those prevailing for similar work in the locality; (3) if acceptance of such employment would either require the employee to join a company union or would interfere with his joining or retaining membership in any bona fide labor organization;

(f) The State law includes provisions which permit modification thereof at the will of the legislature or which prevent the creation of vested rights against modification or repeal of such law at any time.

FINDINGS OF FACT

SEC. 603. In December 1935 the Secretary of Labor shall notify the Secretary of the Treasury and the treasurers of the several States of the names of those States having State laws which, if faithfully executed, may entitle employers to credit for contributions made under such laws in the taxable year commencing January 1, 1936. Annually thereafter the Secretary of Labor shall make findings of fact and certifications to the Secretary of the Treasury, as provided in section 602 of this act, as to compliance by the States with the conditions of subsections (a) to (f), inclusive, of section 602, and shall notify the treasurers of the several States of the names of those States which he finds to comply with such subsections.

UNEMPLOYMENT TRUST FUND

SEC. 604. (a) There is hereby established in the Treasury a trust fund to be known as the "unemployment trust fund." The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to receive and hold in this fund any and all moneys delivered in accordance with section 602 of this act by any State agency to him at the Treasury or at any bank designated by him for the purpose, and to receive and hold the income derived therefrom. The fund or any part thereof may be invested or reinvested in any primary obligations of the United States or in any obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States; and such obligations may be acquired by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price thereof or on original issue at par. Obligations acquired by the fund on original issue, which are issued exclusively to the fund, shall bear interest at the rate equal (after adjustment to the next lower multiple of one-eighth of 1 percent) to the average rate of interest payable at the time of such acquisition upon all primary obligations of the United States (other than obligations issued directly to the fund) then forming part of the public debt. Every other obligation acquired for the fund shall be acquired on such terms as to provide an effective investment yield which shall not be less, by more than one-eighth of 1 percent, than such average rate. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest as herein provided such portion of the fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. The purposes for which obligations of the United States may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are hereby extended to authorize the issuance thereof to the fund for the sole purpose of providing it with suitable investments at such interest rates as may be required for the purposes of this section, notwithstanding the availability in the market of obligations of the United States bearing the same or different interest rates; and to an amount not in excess of the face amount, from time to time outstanding, of obligations originally issued to the fund, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his discretion and on the basis of fair market values to invest and reinvest in, and to sell (or, in the case of primary obligations of the United States, to cancel) any obligations of a kind in which he is authorized to invest the fund, but without limitation as to interest rate. Obligations so acquired shall be held in a special account. All purchases, retirements, and sales under this section shall be deemed to be public-debt transactions.

(b) Each State agency shall have an undivided interest in the fund, but the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain a separate book account for each such State agency, and shall credit quarterly on March 31, June 30, September 30, and December 31 to each such account a proportionate part of the earnings of the fund for the preceding quarter on the basis of the average daily balance of such account.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay out of the fund to any State agency such part of the money held in trust for it as may be duly requisitioned in accordance with the terms of this act. Whenever, in order to make any such payment, it is necessary to dispose of any obligations held in the fund, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell such obligations on the market, or to acquire such obligations for the account of the United States at the market price thereof: Provided, That obligations originally issued to the fund shall be so acquired for the account of the United States at par plus accrued interest.

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint any one or more of the Federal Reserve or national banks as his agents, on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to hold and have custody of the fund or any part thereof, and such banks are hereby authorized to act as such agents.

ADMINISTRATION, REFUNDS, AND PENALTIES

SEC. 605. (a) The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe and publish necessary rules and regulations for the enforcement of the provisions of this title.

(b) Every employer liable for tax under this title shall make a return under oath within 1 month after the close of the year with respect to which such tax is imposed to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which is located his principal place of business. Such return shall contain such information and made in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury may by regulations prescribe. The tax shall, without assessment by the Commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector within 1 month after the close of the year with respect to which the tax is imposed. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 percent a month from the time when the tax became due until paid. All provision of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 600 of the Revenue Act of 1926, shall, insofar as not inconsistent with this act, be applicable in respect of the tax imposed by this act. The Commissioner may extend the time for filing the return of the tax imposed by this act, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, but no such extension shall be for more than 60 days.

(c) Returns required to be filed for the purpose of the tax imposed by this act shall be open to inspection in the same manner, to the same extent, and subject to the same provisions of law as returns made under title II of the Revenue Act of 1926.

(d) The taxpayer may elect to pay the tax in four equal installments, in which case the first installment shall be paid on the date prescribed for the filing of returns, the second installment shall be paid on or before the last day of the third month, the third installment on or before the last day of the sixth month, and the fourth installment on or before the last day of the ninth month, after such day. If any installment is not paid on or before the date fixed for its payment, the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall be paid upon notice and demand from the collector.

(e) At the request of the taxpayer the time for payment of any initial installment of the amount determined as the tax by the taxpayer may be extended under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for a period not to exceed 6 months from the date prescribed for the payment of such installment. In such case the amount in respect of which the extension is granted shall be paid (with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 percent per month) on or before the date of the expiration of the period of the extension.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 606. When used in this title the term "employer" shall mean any person, partnership, association, corporation, whether domestic or foreign, or the legal representative, trustee in bankruptcy, receiver, or trustee thereof, or the legal representative of a deceased person, who or whose agent or predecessor in interest has, within each of 13 or more calendar weeks in the taxable year, employed at least four persons in employment subject to this title, except that the term "employer" shall not include the Federal Government, the governments of the several States, municipal corporations, or other governmental instrumentalities. In determining whether an employer employs enough persons to be an "employer" subject hereto, and determining for what tax he is liable hereunder, he shall whenever he contracts with any subcontractor for any work which is part of his usual trade, occupation, profession, or business, be deemed to employ all persons employed by such subcontractor on such work, and he alone shall be liable for the tax measured by wages paid to such persons for such work; except as any such subcontractor, who would in the absence of the foregoing provision be liable to pay said tax, accepts exclusive liability for said tax under an agreement with such employer made pursuant to regulations promulgated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"Employment" shall mean any employment in which substantially all of the person's work is, or was, performed within the continental United States under any contract of hire, oral or written, express or implied, whether such person was hired and paid directly by the employer or through any other person employed by the employer, provided the employer had actual or constructive knowledge of such contract; except that for the purposes of this title it shall not include any employment included in any unemployment compensation system (other than for the District of Columbia) established by an act of Congress.

"Wages" shall mean every form of remuneration for employment received by a person from his employer, whether paid directly or indirectly by the employer, including salaries, commissions, bonuses, and the reasonable money value of board, rent, housing, lodging, payments in kind, and similar advantages.

"Pay roll" shall mean the total amount of all wages paid by the employer during the taxable year to persons employed by him in employment subject to this act.

"State" shall include the District of Columbia.

"State law" shall mean a statute enacted by any one of the several States which provides for systematic compensation and the creation of an unemployment fund under the direction of a State agency, requires contributions from employers, whether or not they are national banks, and whether or not they are engaged in interstate commerce, except insofar as they are included in any unemployment compensation system (other than one for the District of Columbia) established by act of Congress, and which may require that employees and/or the State also contribute.

"Contributions" shall mean the amount which the employer has duly paid, as required by a State law, in and for the taxable year, into an unemployment fund.

"Unemployment fund" shall mean a special fund, established under a State law, and administered by a State agency in trust for the payment of compensation, and shall include so much of such fund as is administered as a pooled fund (which shall never be less, except insofar as it may be diminished by payment of compensation, than the amount raised by contributions measured by 1 percent of pay roll) and so much, if any, for which the State agency maintains separate accounts for individual employers or groups of employers who are required to make contributions.

"State agency" shall mean any State officer, board, or other authority designated, under a State law, to direct the administration of an unemployment fund in such State.

"Pooled fund" shall mean an unemployment fund or any part thereof in which all contributions are mingled and undivided, and from which compensation is payable to all eligible employees, except that it is payable to persons employed by employers for whom individual or group reserve accounts are maintained by the State agency only when such accounts, and any other liability of employers for compensation, are exhausted.

"Reserve account" shall mean a separate account, maintained by a State agency, of contributions paid by an employer or group of employers, from which compensation is payable to the employees of such employer or group unless such account is exhausted.

"Guaranteed employment account" shall mean a separate account, maintained by a State agency, of contributions paid by an employer or group of employers who guarantee full wages, for not less than 40 weeks in each taxable year to all of their employees, or all of their employees in any plant or plants operated by such employer or group, and give adequate guaranties for the payment thereof as prescribed by the State law, from which account may be payable compensation to each such employee if his guaranty is not renewed and he is otherwise eligible for benefits under such law.

"Compensation" shall mean the cash benefits payable under a compulsory State law to employees for their unemployment.

"Employee" as used in this title shall mean any employed person who is covered by a State law and/or may become eligible for compensation thereunder.

"Tax" shall mean the gross tax imposed on the employer for the taxable year under section 601 of this act, except that when it is used in section 605 "tax" shall mean the said gross tax minus any amounts credited in accordance with sections 602 and 607 of this act.

"Taxable year" shall mean the year from January 1 to December 31, inclusive, or any portion of such year.

ALLOWANCE OF ADDITIONAL CREDITS

SEC. 607. Any employer qualifying under section 608 of this act who has made contributions and has reduced them under a State law which initially required uniform contributions from all employers making contributions, and which thereafter allows certain employers to reduce their contributions, may, for any taxable year thereafter, credit against the tax an amount in addition to the credit allowed under section 602 of this act, except that in no instance shall an employer's total credits under this act exceed 90 percent of his tax. The additional credit under this section shall be equal to the difference between (a) the amount of contributions (measured by his pay roll attributable to such State) actually required of and duly paid by such employer for such year under such law, and (b) the amount of such contributions which he would have been required to make under such law for such year at the highest rate then applicable to any employer or employers required to contribute under such law.

CONDITIONS OF ADDITIONAL CREDIT ALLOWANCE

SEC. 608. No additional credit shall be allowed under section 607 of this act except to an employer who—

(a) Has, since contributions were first required of him under such law, made contributions, and is required to continue to contribute to a pooled fund in the State whose law allows the reduction for which such credit is claimed, at a rate of at least 1 percent of his pay roll attributable to such State;

(b) If he is permitted to reduce or cease his contributions to a reserve account, (1) under a State law requiring the State agency to maintain reserve accounts for each employer or group of employers making contributions, is allowed to do so only when the benefits payable from such reserve account have not been scaled down during the taxable year because of the inadequacy of such reserve account and only when such reserve account amounts to not less than 15 percent of the total pay roll, attributable to such State, of such employer or group during the taxable year; or (2) under a State law permitting the State agency to maintain reserve accounts for some employers, or groups of employers, is allowed to do so only when such employers or groups have guaranteed the full payment of compensation to their employees regardless of the adequacy of their reserve accounts, and only when such reserve accounts amount to not less than 15 percent of the total pay roll, attributable to such State, of such employer or group during the taxable year;

(c) If he is permitted to contribute at a reduced rate as to contributions measured by the guaranteed wages paid in such State, is allowed to do so only if the State agency maintains a separate guaranteed employment account for him individually or as one of a group of employers, and only if he or such group has fulfilled his or its guaranty, and only when the amount credited in such guaranteed employment account amounts to not less than 7½ percent of so much of the total pay roll of such employer group for the taxable year as represents the wages guaranteed under such law by such employer or group;

(d) If he is permitted to contribute at a reduced rate, but not at a rate of less than 1 percent of pay roll attributable to such State, to a pooled fund, is allowed to do so if the State law permits contributions to a pooled fund, over and above 1 percent of such pay roll, to be made at varying rates: Provided, That such variations are not allowed within 5 years after contributions are first paid under such law, and then are allowed only on a basis of unemployment compensation experience.

TITLE VII

MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH

SECTION 701. (a) In order to enable the Federal Government to cooperate with the State agencies of health in extending and strengthening services for the health of mothers and children, especially in rural areas and in areas suffering from severe economic distress, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $4,000,000 from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter, the sum of $4,000,000. From these amounts so much, not to exceed 5 percent, as the Children's Bureau shall find to be necessary for administering the provisions of this section and for investigations and reports related thereto, shall be deducted annually for this purpose, to be available until expended. The remainder shall be allocated for furthering and strengthening State and local health services to mothers and children, extending maternity nursing services in counties predominantly rural, and conducting special demonstration and research in maternal care and other aspects of maternal and child health service. For each fiscal year allocations of the appropriations herein authorized shall be as follows:

(1) For furthering and extending maternal and child health and maternity nursing services, the Secretary of Labor shall allot $20,000 to each State and apportion $1,000,000 among the States in the proportion which the number of live births in each State bears to the total number of live births in the United States as determined annually by the latest available statistics for the United States birth registration area: Provided, That no allotment made to a State under this paragraph shall exceed the sum of the amount made available by the State for the purposes of this paragraph and the amount allotted to it under paragraph (2) of this section;

(2) The Secretary of Labor shall apportion among States unable, because of severe economic distress, to match by themselves in full the amounts made available under paragraph (1), for their use in matching such sums, $800,000;

(3) The Secretary of Labor shall allocate the remainder for special demonstrations and research in maternal care in rural areas, and in other aspects of maternal and child health.

(b) The sums provided under paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) of this section shall be available until the close of the succeeding fiscal year. So much of the amount apportioned under paragraph (1) to any State for any fiscal year as remains unpaid to such State at the close thereof shall be availble until the close of the succeeding fiscal year for expenditures in that State, under the conditions specified in paragraph (1), or if not requested by the State agency of health, for apportionment among States as provided in paragraph (2).

(c) In order to receive the benefits of paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (a) of this section, a State shall, through its State agency of health, submit to the Children's Bureau detailed plans for effectuating the purposes of this section within such State and information concerning the amounts made available by the State for such purposes, which, unless exceptional circumstances can be shown, must at least equal the amounts available for similar purposes at the time of the passage of this act; and if an allocation under subsection (a), paragraph (2), is requested, the conditions leading to such a request. A State plan must include reasonable provision for State administrative and supervisory services, for furthering local maternal and child health services administered by local public-health units for State financial participation, and for cooperation with medical, nursing, and welfare groups and organizations; and must give due consideration to the development of demonstration services or services of a more permanent character in rural and other needy areas or among groups of the population in special need. When the Chief of the Children's Bureau deems a State plan and the administration thereof to be in reasonable conformity with the provisions of this section and in accordance with accepted standards of public-health practice developed by Federal bureaus and other agencies, he shall approve the same and send due notice of such approval to the Secretary of Labor and the State agency concerned.

CARE OF CRIPPLED CHILDREN

SEC. 702. (a) In order to enable the Federal Government to cooperate with the State agencies concerned with the provision of medical care and other services for crippled children, especially in rural areas, there is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, and for each fiscal year thereafter there is authorized to be appropriated $3,000,000. From this amount, so much, not to exceed 5 percent, as the Children's Bureau shall find to be necessary for administering the provisions of this section and for investigations and reports related thereto, shall be deducted annually for this purpose to be available until expended. The remainder shall be allotted to States for purposes of locating crippled children, and of providing facilities for diagnosis and care, hospitalization, and after care, especially for children living in rural areas. For each fiscal year the Secretary of Labor shall allot $20,000 to each State and apportion the remainder among the States on the basis of need as set forth in plans developed by the State agencies concerned and approved by the Children's Bureau: Provided, That except in the case of severe economic distress or other exceptional circumstances, no allotment under this subsection shall exceed the sum made available by the State for the purposes of this section.

(b) In order to receive the benefits of this section a State must, through an authorized State agency concerned with the provision of medical care and other services for crippled children, submit to the Children's Bureau a detailed plan for effectuating the purposes of this section within such State, and information concerning the amounts made available by the State for the purposes of this section, which should at least equal the amounts made available for similar purposes during the fiscal year next preceding the passage of this act, unless exceptional circumstances can be shown; and if an allocation in addition to the original allotment of $20,000 is requested, the conditions leading to such a request. A State plan must include reasonable provision for State administration, adequate medical care, hospitalization and after care, and cooperation with medical, health, and welfare groups and organizations. When the Chief of the Children's Bureau deems a State plan and the administration thereof to be in reasonable conformity with the provisions of this section, he shall approve the same and send due notice of such approval to the Secretary of Labor and the State agency concerned.

AID TO CHILD-WELFARE SERVICES

SEC. 703. (a) In order to enable the Federal Government to cooperate with the State agencies of public welfare in extending and strengthening, especially in rural areas and areas suffering from severe economic distress, welfare services for the protection and care of homeless, dependent, and neglected children, and children in danger of becoming delinquent, there is hereby appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,500,000, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $1,500,000 for each fiscal year thereafter. From these amounts so much, not to exceed 5 percent, as the Children's Bureau shall find to be necessary for administering the provisions of this section and for investigations and reports related thereto, shall be deducted annually for this purpose, to be available until expended. The remainder shall be allotted to States for the purposes of assistance to local units, especially in rural areas, in the development of public child-welfare services and for improvement of standards and methods of child-caring service throughout the State. For each fiscal year, from the appropriations herein authorized,

(1) The Secretary of Labor shall apportion $1,000,000 among the States, allotting $10,000 to each State and the balance to States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the United States: Provided, That no allotment made to a State under this paragraph shall exceed the sum of the amount made available by the State for the purposes of this section and the amount apportioned to it under paragraph (2) of this subsection.

(2) The Secretary of Labor shall apportion the remainder among States unable, because of severe economic distress, to match in full the amounts allotted under paragraph (1), for their use in matching such sums, or for special demonstrations of methods of community child-welfare service.

(b) The sums provided under paragraph (2) of subsection (a) shall be available for expenditure until the close of the succeeding fiscal year. So much of the amount apportioned under paragraph (1) of subsection (a) to any State for any fiscal year as remains unpaid to such State at the close thereof, shall be available until the close of the succeeding fiscal year for expenditures in that State under the conditions prescribed in such paragraph (1), or, if not requested by the State agency of welfare, for allocation to States as provided in such paragraph (2).

(c) In order to receive the benefits of this section a State must, through its State department of public welfare, or, if there be none or more than one such agency, through a State agency designated by the legislature or provisionally designated by the Governor if the legislature be not in session, to cooperate with the Children's Bureau under the provisions of this section, submit to the Children's Bureau a detailed plan for effectuating the purposes of this section within such State, and information concerning the amounts made available by the State for such purposes, which should at least equal the amounts made available for similar purposes during the fiscal year next preceding the passage of this act, unless exceptional circumstances can be shown; and, if an allocation under paragraph (2) of subsection (a) of this section is requested, the conditions leading to such a request. A plan must include reasonable provision for State administration, State financial participation, furthering local public child-welfare services, and cooperation with health and welfare groups and organizations, and give due consideration to demonstration services or services of a more permanent character in rural or other needy areas or among groups of the population in special need. When the Chief of the Children's Bureau deems a State plan and the administration thereof to be in reasonable conformity with the provisions of this section, he shall approve the same and send due notice of such approval to the State agency concerned.

PARTICIPATION BY CHILDREN'S BUREAU

SEC. 704. (a) Out of the amounts authorized in this title the Children's Bureau is authorized to employ such experts, assistants, clerks, and other persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, to be taken from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission, and to purchase such supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures, and apparatus, and to incur such travel and other expenses as it may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this title. It shall be the duty of the Children's Bureau to make or cause to be made such studies, investigations, and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this title.

(b) Within 30 days after an appropriation has been made under the authority of this title, the Secretary of Labor shall make the apportionments on the basis of live births and of population as provided herein, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the treasurers of the several States the amounts apportioned for the purposes specified, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amounts estimated by the Children's Bureau to be necessary for administering the provisions of this title.

(c) Within 60 days after any appropriation authorized by this title has been made, and as often thereafter while such appropriation remains unexpended as changed conditions may warrant, the Secretary of Labor shall ascertain and certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer of the United States the amounts to which each State is entitled under the provisions of this title, in accordance with plans submitted by the States and approved by the Children's Bureau. Such certificate shall show that the State has complied with all requirements of the pertinent sections of the title. When in conformity with the provisions of the title such certificate, until revoked as provided in subsection (d) hereof, shall be sufficient authority to the Treasurer to make payment to the State in accordance therewith.

(d) Each State agency cooperating with the Children's Bureau under the provisions of this title shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed or requested by the Bureau. The Bureau, after due notice in writing, setting forth the reasons therefor, may revoke any existing certificate provided for in subsection (c) whenever it shall determine that any State agency has not properly expended or supervised the expenditure of moneys paid to it for the purposes and in accordance with the provisions of this title. When so withheld the State agency may appeal to the Secretary of Labor who may either affirm or reverse the action of the Bureau with such directions as he shall consider proper.

(e) The Children's Bureau shall perform the duties assigned to it by this title under the supervision of the Secretary of Labor, and he shall include in his annual report to Congress a full account of the administration of this title and expenditures of the moneys herein authorized.

(f) As used in this title, the term "State" shall include Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the District of Columbia.

TITLE VIII

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC HEALTH

SECTION 801. There is hereby appropriated, from funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter the sum of $10,000,000 to be allocated to the Bureau of the Public Health Service to be expended as hereinafter provided.

LOCAL PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICES

SEC. 802. From the amounts appropriated under this title the Bureau of the Public Health Service shall annually allot $8,000,000 to the several States, in amounts determined on the basis of the need of each State for such assistance, for the purpose of developing State health services including the training of personnel for State and local health work and for the purpose of assisting counties and/or other political subdivisions of the States in maintaining adequate public-health programs. Payment of any allotment, or installment thereof, shall be made only after the Secretary of the Treasury has made a finding of fact that there is need to make such money available in such State, and has notified the Treasurer of the United States to pay such allotment or installment, and the amount thereof. Any money appropriated for the purposes of this section but not expended during the fiscal year shall be available for payment of allotments to the States in the next fiscal year.

BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

SEC. 803 (a) From the amounts appropriated under this title, $2,000,000 shall annually be available to the Bureau of the Public Health Service, for the further investigation of disease and problems of sanitation, and related matters. Out of the amounts made available in this section the Bureau of the Public Health Service is authorized to employ such experts, assistants, clerks, and other persons in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, to be taken from the eligible lists of the Civil Service Commission, and to purchase such supplies, material, equipment, office fixtures, and apparatus, and to incur such travel and other expenses as it may deem necessary for carrying out the purposes of this title.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall make all rules and regulations necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

ACTION OF THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL

SEC. 804. The Comptroller General is authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States for payment of allotments in the amounts notified him by the Secretary of the Treasury.

TITLE IX

SEPARABILITY

SECTION 901. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

RESERVATION OF POWER

SEC. 902. The right to alter, amend, or repeal any or all provisions of this act is hereby reserved to the Congress.

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 903. This act may be known as "The Economic Security Act."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Virginia so that he may secure action on the bill of which he is in charge.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I hope that we may dispose of the bill very speedily, and I should like now to proceed with its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3410) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment of the committee, on page 4, line 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was under the heading "Securities and Exchange Commission", on page 24, line 4, after the words "rent of" to strike out "building and equipment at the seat of government and elsewhere" and insert "quarters outside the District of Columbia; rental of equipment"; and in line 6, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$2,000,000" and insert "$2,234,494", so as to read:

For five commissioners, and for all other authorized expenditures of the Securities and Exchange Commission in performing the duties imposed by law or in pursuance of law and for other personal services, including employment of experts when necessary; contract stenographic reporting services; supplies and equipment; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, directories, periodicals, newspaper and press clippings; travel expenses, including the expense of attendance, when specifically authorized by the Commission, at meetings concerned with the work of the Securities and Exchange Commission; garage rental; foreign postage; mileage and witness fees; rent of quarters outside the District of Columbia; rental of equipment; and other necessary expenses; $2,234,494:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 14, to increase the total appropriation for the Securities and Exchange Commission from $2,030,000 to $2,264,494.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Veterans' Administration", on page 29, line 2, after the word "veterans", to insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That when found to be in the best interest of the United States, not to exceed $500,000 of this amount may be used for payments to State institutions caring for and maintaining veterans, suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments, who are in such institutions on the date of the enactment of this act.

So as to read:

Administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services: For all salaries and expenses of the Veterans' Administration, including the expenses of maintenance and operation of medical, hospital, and domiciliary services of the Veterans' Administration, in carrying out the duties, powers, and functions devolving upon it pursuant to the authority contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to consolidate and coordinate governmental activities affecting war veterans", approved July 3, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 38, secs. 11–11f), and any and all laws for which the Veterans' Administration is now or may hereafter be charged with administering, $86,700,000: Provided, That not to exceed $3,500 of this amount shall be available for expenses, except membership fees, of employees detailed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of medical science and annual national conventions of organized war veterans: Provided further, That when found to be in the best interest of the United States, not to exceed $500,000 of this amount may be used for payments to State institutions caring for and maintaining veterans, suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments, who are in such institutions on the date of the enactment of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 4, after "February", to strike out "29" and insert "20", so as to read:

Hospital and domiciliary facilities: There is hereby appropriated under the authorization acts specified, the remaining balances not heretofore appropriated, as follows: $850,000 (act of April 23, 1928, 45 Stat., p. 447); $25,000 (act of February 20, 1929, 45 Stat., p. 1248).

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is now open to amendment. If there be no amendment offered, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments, and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill or to the amendments. However, it is a large bill—an annual appropriation bill—and I think notice should be given to those who are absent. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adams | Costigan | Lewis | Robinson |

Mr. LEWIS. I have previously announced the absence of certain Senators and have given the reasons for their absence. Having done that this morning, I reannounce those absences and the reasons therefor, and ask that the announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

CONNECTICUT BAR ASSOCIATION'S REPORT ON WORLD COURT

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the report of the special committee of the State Bar Association of Connecticut on the World Court.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The committee submitted a brief historical statement to show the present situation with respect to the proposed adherence of the United States to the statute creating the Permanent Court of International Justice, commonly termed the "World Court", and then in conclusion reported as follows:]

Your committee has endeavored to consider the question in all of its aspects and has concluded that—

1. The World Court, in the establishment and administration of which this country has through its representatives had a part, is well constituted to function effectively in the settlement of international differences. As an institution for the preservation of the peace of the world, it has the confidence of other nations, both great and small, and merits the confidence and respect of our own people.

2. Whether the United States does or does not become a party, the Court is certain to contribute by its decisions to a broader understanding of and respect for international law, and to a more exact definition of its principles. For our own interest and protection we should participate in this definition and application of international law.

3. Adherence to the protocol and the statute of the Court will not bring the United States into any new relation with the League of Nations.

We recommend the passage of the resolution which is herewith submitted.

LEONARD M. DAGGETT,
CHARLES WELLES GROSS,
HARRISON HEWITT,
CARROLL C. HINCKS,
SANFORD STODDARD,
Committee.

[Resolution]

Believing that the continued prosperity and security of the United States depends upon the continuation of peace at least among the greater nations of the world, and

Believing that the peace of the world can permanently be maintained only by the existence of a well-recognized body of law defining and confirming the rights of nations with respect to each other; and

Believing likewise that the future economic and commercial growth of the United States would be stimulated and stabilized by the development of a comprehensive system of international law, and

Believing that the United States, by its negotiation and ratification of the Kellogg pact, so-called, having renounced war as an instrument of national policy, should now cooperate in the development of a system of international law and the judicial administration thereof, which shall be conducive to the prevention of misunderstandings and available for the settlement of controversies between the nations; and

Believing that the framework of international law can be developed systematically and administered effectively only by a permanent tribunal of permanent judges of unquestionable integrity, ability, and impartiality; and

Believing that the Permanent Court of International Justice is well constituted fully to meet these high qualifications and is the only international tribunal now or heretofore existing which does satisfy these requirements; and

Believing further that the accession of the United States to the membership of the Court will increase its prestige and stability and thus further the ultimate cause of world peace without jeopardy to the sovereignty or interests of the United States:

Now, therefore, we, members of the State Bar Association of the State of Connecticut, in our annual meeting assembled, do hereby resolve:

Resolved, That ratification by the United States of America of the protocol of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as signed by direction of the President of the United States on December 9, 1929, is required both by the self-interest of the United States and by its natural obligation as a member of the community of nations, and do further resolve that a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to the Senators from Connecticut.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I submit for printing in the RECORD certain data relating to the Interparliamentary Union.

The thirty-second annual meeting of our United States of America group of the Interparliamentary Union has been called by its president, Representative ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, to meet next Monday, January 21, in the committee room of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs at 10:30 a. m.

I offer therefore and ask that there be printed in the RECORD—

First. The minutes of the Thirty-first Annual Meeting of the United States of America Group of the Interparliamentary Union.

Second. The remarks by President ANDREW J. MONTAGUE at the last annual meeting of the group, January 19, 1934.

Third. An account of the Thirtieth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union, held at Istanbul, Turkey, September 24–29, 1934, by Dr. Arthur Deerin Call, permanent executive secretary of our Interparliamentary Union.

There being no objection, the data were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION THIRTIETH CONFERENCE, ISTANBUL, TURKEY, SEPTEMBER 24–29, 1934

(By Arthur Deerin Call, permanent executive secretary of the American group)

(Dr. Call has attended 14 of the Conferences of the Interparliamentary Union, as follows: The Hague, 1913 (as observer); Stockholm, 1921; Vienna, 1922; Copenhagen, 1923; Berne and Geneva, 1924; Washington, 1925 (as director of the Conference); Paris, 1927; Berlin, 1928; Geneva, 1929 (meetings only of the council and permanent committees); London and Dublin, 1930; Bucharest, 1931; Geneva, 1932; Madrid, 1933; Istanbul, 1934.)

For a long time the United States Government has annually contributed money to the support of the Interparliamentary Union, with its headquarters at Geneva, Switzerland. Delegates from the Congress have attended all but 6 of its 30 Conferences. Twice—1904, 1925—the Conference has been held in the United States.

Senators Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, and Tom Connally, of Texas, and Representatives Thomas C. Cochran, of Pennsylvania, and William B. Oliver, of Alabama, were the delegates of the United States group to the recent Conference at Istanbul, September 24–29, 1934. Senator ROBINSON was accompanied by Mrs. Robinson. Representative ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, president of the group and member of the executive committee of the Union, found it impossible at the last moment, because of ill health, to attend. Senator CONNALLY substituted for Governor MONTAGUE on the executive committee; Senator ROBINSON and Mr. OLIVER served as members of the council; Mr. Cochran was chosen as one of the vice presidents of the Conference.

At the opening of the Conference, Monday, September 24, all members of the United States delegation were present. Mr. Cochran and I had joined with Mr. Oliver at Rome, and the three of us taking the boat at Brindisi for Istanbul on the 21st were gratified the next day at Piraeus, seaport of Athens, to greet Senator and Mrs. Robinson coming aboard. The five of us sailed away that evening from Athens, by the southernmost point of Attica, with its classic ruin of a temple to Poseidon, on beyond the lower edges of storied Euboea, out of a sunset of sunsets. After a marvel of a moonlit night through a sparkling Aegean Sea, a fair morning through the Dardenelles and a perfect day across the Sea of Marmora to the Bosphorus, the boat docked at Istanbul Sunday afternoon, the 23d, where friends and officials extended the kindliest of welcomes. After the shortest possible trip from home, Senator CONNALLY arrived early the next morning by train direct from Paris. All of us stopped at the Pera Palas Hotel, where, thanks to the foresight of the Turkish hosts in general and to the gracious attentions of our Government's representatives in particular, every possible arrangement had been made for our comfort, including an automobile and driver for the duration of the Conference. Our first impressions of Istanbul and its Golden Horn were of a rolling skyline, domed and minaretted, beautiful in line, color, charm, and romance.

THE NEW TURKEY

It is one thing to read about people; quite another to meet them at first hand. This is especially true of the modern Turks. Every delegate had heard of very great changes that had taken place throughout Turkey during its 11 years as a republic. Probably few of the visitors, however, were quite prepared for so many signs of occidental energy and direction visible throughout Istanbul and especially in the new capital city of Ankara, a night's train ride away. No such variety of change and achievement within a similar time and area appears to have taken place elsewhere in the world. The facts arouse the interest and attention of every thoughtful observer, especially of statesmen.

The changes that have taken place among those 17,000,000 people since the Treaty of Lausanne in 1923 must be said to be astonishing. The treaty and customary privileges granted to foreigners, under the terms of what for many years had been known as the "capitulations", have been abolished. All foreign troops have evacuated the land. The boundaries have been fixed and within them a unity of racial culture established. Freedom of transit through the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmora and the Bosphorus, has been granted to all nations. The capital was established at Angoro—called by the Turks "Ankara"—October 13, 1923, and on the 29th Turkey was declared a republic, with Mustafa Kemal as its first President. Since March 3, 1924, Turkey has ceased to be a theocracy. The Caliphate, ruling officially the Moslem world, so far as Turkey is concerned, has been abolished and a civil code substituted for the Koran as the law of the State. Fezzes for the men, veils and segregation for the women, polygamy and harems are no more. The Latin alphabet has been substituted for the Arabic, with the result that children can learn to read in 1 year instead of from 2 to 3.

The metric system has been substituted for the older forms of measurements, and our international Gregorian calendar has been adopted. Church schools have been closed since 1924, and the teaching of any religion in school or hospital is forbidden. Primary education is now compulsory for all Turkish-born children in primary schools patterned after the English system. Feudalism has been ended and the property laws revised. The handshake takes the place of the old triple obeisance, and the salaam is forbidden. The hours of the day begin now from midnight instead as heretofore from the changing hour of dawn. It is unlawful to laugh at mad, eccentric, or crippled persons. Men and women must obtain health certificates before they are permitted to marry. The methods of research and survey are being increasingly employed. The system of proper names is being changed, with the view of ending the confusion due to the absence of what we call family names. It is proposed now in Parliament that the Ghazi be granted the family name "Ataturk", meaning, appropriately, Chief Turk. The budget, amounting now approximately to 170,000,000 Turkish pounds, is balanced; has been balanced from the beginning. Through a system of trade equilibrium, there is a de facto stabilization of exchange. Authority prevails; life and property are secure. What appeared to be a characteristic inertia of the people has been largely overcome by a new and active interest in the arts, statistics, manufactures, highways, and railroads, labor laws, education, medicine, and public health. The oriental order of the old Turkey has given way to an occidental social organization and that by the means of a revolution that has been as unique as apparently it has been successful. With much yet to be done, it appears to be becoming broader and deeper, that revolution, heading clearly toward a truly liberal and democratic state.

All these achievements within little over a decade have been due primarily to the ability and audacity of the Ghazi, Mustafa Kêmal, whose virile activities remind one of Russia's Peter the Great, who, at the end of the sixteenth century, also struggled against inertia, ignorance, poverty, superstition, and fanaticism.

The Ghazi, however, heads not an empire but a republic; a republic where only an autocracy had reigned for half a thousand years; a republic free of jingoism and at peace with the world. Every delegate naturally felt it to be a privilege to see something of such a Turkey at first hand.

AMERICAN INTERESTS IN TURKEY

America is interested in all this remarkable development, furthermore, because many Americans have personal relations with various phases of contemporary Turklish life. Robert College, under the presidency of Paul Monroe, and the Women's College, under the deanship of Miss Eleanor I. Burns, within a mile of each other on the hills to the west of the Bosphorus, have just been combined into the International American College, a broadcasting station of international good will. The American hospital at Istanbul, under the direction of Dr. Lorrin A. Shepard, is a very worthy messenger to the Turks of American skill and spirit at their best. Dr. Thomas Whittemore, of America, has been chosen by the Turkish Government to remove the paint and plaster from the magnificent mosaics on the ancient walls of the Mosque of St. Sophia. There are American business men engaged in various phases of Turkey's industrial system. Far from least, American Government officials in Turkey, diplomatic and consular, from Ambassador Skinner and Councilor Shaw throughout, are men of marked ability and understanding. Through all these persons and agencies, America realizes that her ties with Turkey are both real and intimate.

THE CONFERENCE

The Conference was attended by more than 170 delegates from the following countries: Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Egypt, France, Great Britain, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Persia, Poland, Rumania, Spain, Sweden, Turkey, United States, Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria was represented by an observer.

The sessions of the conference were held in the Yildiz Palace, formerly the home of Sultan Abdul Hamid II, and from which during the uprising of the "Young Turks" in 1909 he was dethroned. The beautiful buildings on their high hill, surrounded by their double rows of huge walls and fair gardens of trees and flowers, were occupied by Mohammed VI, last of the Sultans, from 1917 to 1922, when, under the protection of the British, he and the system of Sultans was finally exiled from Turkey forever. The palace was reopened in October 1931 for the meetings of the Second Balkan Conference. It is planned to devote it to the regular use of international gatherings, and it has been refitted and completely organized accordingly.

Compared with previous Conferences the discussions at the general sessions in Istanbul suffered not at all. The meetings were opened by an address by Krasim Pasha, president of the grand national assembly, after which the conference elected as its president Hasan Bey, vice president of the Turkish Parliament, who presided with considerate skill throughout the Conference.

As is the custom, the delegates discussed through Monday and Tuesday morning the report of the secretary general, which, distributed to all the delegates before the conference, contained a thoughtful summary of the international situation. During this discussion, at the urgent invitation of the Conference, Senator ROBINSON, of the United States, gave a résumé of the new deal in this country.

Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday the general assembly devoted its time to a discussion of a report of the special committee on the general phases of security and disarmament. In spite of the languishing labors of the Disarmament Conference, and of the fact that several of the delegates were of the opinion that for the Union to spend time upon such a discussion would be useless, the debates here reached the highest point of intensity. The two motions argued at length related first to the reduction of armaments, and, second, to the establishment of security.

Under disarmament it was finally voted to recommend as most urgent and most easily realized: First, the creation of a permanent disarmament committee; second, the juridical and automatic international control of armament; third, publicity and control of expenditures on national defense; fourth, the regulation or abolition of the private manufacture of arms; fifth, the regulation of the international traffic in arms.

The Conference also expressed the wish that the following measures might be adopted as soon as possible: (1) The complete prohibition of chemical, incendiary, and bacterial warfare, both in the air and by any other means; (2) the immediate and unreserved prohibition of bombing from the air; (3) the abolition by successive steps of military and naval air forces; (4) the international supervision and complete publicity of civil aviation with the view of preventing its application for military purposes; (5) the internationalization of civil aviation.

It was the debate over the problems of security, however, that aroused the greatest divergence of views. The American delegation found itself unable to agree to all of the resolutions proposed under this part of the program, because of certain items patently contrary to established American policies. In spite of American opposition, however, the following recommendations were adopted by a majority of the delegates: (1) The prohibition of any resort to force or violence; (2) the creation of a consultative body to meet immediately at the request of any party in case of a violation of the prohibition against violence; (3) that all states should accede to the London Convention of July 4, 1933, which aimed to define an aggressor; (4) the application to the aggressor of one or several sanctions of a diplomatic, financial, economic, or military character, entailing possibly the creation of an international armed force, particularly of an air police force; (5) the adoption by the contracting parties of all preliminary measures of a legislature or administrative nature likely to facilitate the immediate application of sanctions; (6) the nonrecognition of any agreement or new state of affairs brought about by the use of force or violence.

Thursday the Conference devoted itself to the consideration of two social questions. One of these had to do with the regulation of hours of work. The Conference concluded it to be indispensable that the possibilities of employment to the greatest number should be regulated by an international convention. The purposes of such a convention would be: (1) To prevent intellectual and manual workers from becoming the victims of a system faced with overproduction in certain quarters of the globe; (2) to combat the moral crisis following prolonged unemployment; (3) to develop the means of intellectual and moral advancement.

It was believed that such a convention might not only preserve purchasing power of wage earners but make it possible for them to share more fully in the benefits of technical progress. The Conference expressed its belief in shorter working hours as a means of increasing employment, without violence to the purchasing power of the workers. The recommendations under this heading were addressed primarily to the International Labor Conference.

As a result of its discussions of unemployment among young people, the resolutions of the Conference took more the form of suggestions as possible bases for international regulations. These suggestions favored the extension of compulsory school attendance and the multiplication of efforts to the end that the young may develop their professional capacities. Attention was called to the possibilities of enabling young people to profit from rambles combined with talks, excursions, visits to factories, workshops, museums, and the like. It was believed that official employment agencies should have special departments for young people which should keep in constant touch with the educational authorities, and that this department should follow up young persons for whom work has been found, strengthen its bonds with young people, and do its share to inculcate feelings of national brotherhood and international solidarity.

Friday being the Turkish Sabbath, the day was devoted to a boat trip to the Princes' Islands in the Sea of Marmora, with lunch at the Yacht Club in Buyukada, followed by a sail through the Bosphorus, then back to the Palace of Beylerbey on the Asiatic shore, where refreshments were provided while the sun was setting over the mosques and minarets of Istanbul across the water.

On Saturday the delegates discussed the evolution of the representative system and adopted 18 resolutions, the first 4 of which dealt with the passing of the budget; the next 6 with remedies for the imperfections of parliamentary procedure; the next 5 with governmental stability; the fourteenth and fifteenth with the separation of political and judicial powers; and the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth with the independence of parliaments.

The discussion on these technical phases of the parliamentary system, while of a scientific nature, were probably of more value to most of the delegates than those of any other session. The Conference agreed that parliaments should have specified periods within which to pass their budgets and that when a member proposes any expenditures they should at the same time indicate the means of obtaining the necessary funds. It held that parliaments should maintain control over the powers of their executives in cases of provisional and emergency measures. It pointed out the importance of national and international legislative information services, and of consultative bodies to cooperate in the drafting of laws, particularly in the economic field.

A CONCLUDING STATEMENT

It is impossible to conclude even this brief statement about the Conference at Istanbul without reference again to the Turkish hosts. Simply to enumerate the events gives no adequate picture of the reception accorded by the Turkish parliamentarians. On the first day of the Conference the Turkish group entertained the members of the council with a luncheon at the Pera Palas Hotel. On the evening of that day the president of the Grand National Assembly received the members of the Conference in the Ghazi's Palace on the shores of the Bosphorus. On the afternoon of the second day the members of the Conference and their families were escorted through the shrines and museums of Istanbul, all followed in the evening by a banquet at the Hotel Tokatlyan, given by the mayor of the city. On the evening of the third day the Turkish group entertained the members of the Conference at the Dolmabahçe Palace, a splendid relic of the Ottoman Empire, stretching for a third of a mile along the Bosphorus.

Reference has already been made to the excursion on Friday, the fourth day. After the close of the Conference on Saturday, the 29th, Chukru Kaya Bey, Minister for Home Affairs, and Minister for Foreign Affairs during the absence in Switzerland of Terfik Rüshtü Bey, gave a farewell banquet at the Pera Palas Hotel. It is on occasions such as these, and that in spite of the divergencies of races and languages, that delegates form acquaintances and often friendships of the utmost value. In the case of this Conference at Istanbul they left the very distinct impression of a people competent in organization, intelligent in action, and gracious as comrades and hosts.

Finally, when recently I asked Senator ROBINSON to express his view of the Conference, he replied with words I should be glad to make my own. He said:

"The Conference of the Interparliamentary Union, which met at Istanbul, September 24–29, 1934, considered many important subjects pertaining to international amity and world peace. One who participated in the meetings could not fail to be impressed with the earnestness of the delegates. The discussions took a broad range and demonstrated profound thought and liberal intelligence on the part of many of the speakers.

"The issues before the Conference revolved around resolutions pertaining to security, disarmament, representative government, and kindred topics of vital interest and importance to lawmaking bodies. The Conference was especially helpful to those in positions of legislative responsibility, because it afforded reliable information touching the state of the public mind in the countries represented in relation to subject matter of the very greatest concern to everyone. There was evidenced a real desire to encourage and maintain amicable relations among the sovereignties in the period of anxiety and distress through which mankind is struggling."

THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA GROUP

Remarks by President ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, January 19, 1934

Friends of the Interparliamentary Union: This is the thirty-first annual meeting of our group. A year ago it was my privilege to remind you of certain phases of the Interparliamentary Union, calculated to promote the enduring interests of our people. On December 23, 1932, I appeared before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations. I then took occasion to remind the committee that the Interparliamentary Union was founded in Paris in 1888, upon the initiative of Sir William Randal Cremer, of the British House of Commons. Because of his achievements in behalf of the Interparliamentary Union, Sir William was crowned with the Legion of Honor by the President of France, knighted by King Edward VII of England, and, in 1903, awarded the Nobel peace prize. The Twenty-ninth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union was held October 4–10, 1933, in Madrid, Spain. The Conferences have been as follows:

1. Paris, 1889
2. London, 1890
3. Rome, 1891
4. Berne, 1892
5. The Hague, 1894
6. Brussels, 1895
7. Budapest, 1896
8. Brussels, 1897
9. Christiana, 1899
10. Paris, 1900
11. Vienna, 1903
12. St. Louis, 1904
13. Brussels, 1905
14. London, 1906
15. Berlin, 1908
16. Brussels, 1910
17. Geneva, 1912
18. The Hague, 1913
19. Stockholm, 1921
20. Vienna, 1922
21. Copenhagen, 1923
22. Berne and Geneva, 1924
23. Washington and Ottawa, 1925
24. Paris, 1927
25. Berlin, 1928
26. London, 1930
27. Bucharest, 1931
28. Geneva, 1932
29. Madrid, 1933

With the exception of the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh our Congress has been represented at every one of these Conferences. The next Conference will be held next September in Istanbul (Constantinople).

The American group of the Interparliamentary Union was organized in 1903, upon the initiative of Representative Richard Bartholdt, of Missouri, who had just returned from the Conference in Vienna, assisted by Representative Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, by Representative Samuel J. Barrows, of New York, and others.

That year the United States invited the Interparliamentary Union to hold its Twelfth Conference in connection with the World's Fair at St. Louis in 1904. The invitation was accepted, and for the expenses of the Conference the United States appropriated $50,000. Because of the work of that Conference, President Roosevelt was led to initiate the Second Hague Peace Conference.

Again in 1925 the United States was host to the Interparliamentary Union, this time in the city of Washington, for which the Congress again appropriated $50,000. Upon the request of the Congress, President Coolidge extended the invitation to this Conference. Forty-one parliaments, the largest number in the history of the Union, sent delegates. The last sessions of the Conference were held in Ottawa, Canada.

During the early years delegates to the various Conferences paid their own expenses, the United States making no appropriations for the support of the American group. Later, funds were collected from outside the Congress with which to pay in part the expenses of the group and the traveling expenses of the delegates. Following the war our Government appropriated $1,500 and then $2,000 for the support of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union, with headquarters at Geneva. At the nineteenth annual meeting of the American group, February 24, 1922, Mr. Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, pointed out that for a good many years Congress had appropriated $2,000 annually toward maintaining the bureau of the union at Geneva, and recommended that the amount be increased to $4,000, which was agreed to by the Congress of that year. In 1925 the Congress raised the amount of this contribution to the central office at Geneva to $6,000.

At the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the American group, February 24, 1928, attention was called to the unhappy financial condition of the group—that there was no provision for dues for assessments, no aid from Congress; and that the group was the recipient of charity. Senator McKinley, then president of the group, found it necessary to pay many of the bills out of his own pocket. The treasurer, Mr. ADOLPH J. SABATH, was known to ease the situation from time to time from his own funds. The Carnegie endowment for international peace contributed toward the support of the group for several years.

The American Peace Society furnished office space for the library of the group, considerable printing, and the services of its executive secretary. Generous as all these acts were, it was thought that they ought not to be necessary. In 1928 the appropriation for the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union at Geneva was raised from $6,000 to $10,000. In 1929, 1930, and 1931 this amount continued, and for each of these years $10,000 was appropriated for the expenses of the United States of America group. In 1932 Congress failed to appropriate anything for the expenses of the group and, without notice to the Bureau at Geneva, it reduced its appropriation from $10,000 to a little less than $7,500. I have learned that our contribution to the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union last year of $7,500 was normally 38,500 Swiss francs; but because of the drop of the dollar the Bureau was able to realize only 24,750 Swiss francs, a reduction of about 37 percent. For the coming year the further drop in the dollar will mean that our appropriation to the Bureau will drop from 38,500 to 23,000 francs, a loss to the Bureau of 15,000 Swiss francs.

No one can doubt that the Interparliamentary Union is an international organization of value, especially to all members of parliaments. Practically every government of the Interparliamentary Union provides a grant for the expenses of the Union. Many of the groups are supported by national appropriations. A number of the governments furnish special headquarters in their parliament buildings for their interparliamentary groups. Fourteen South American governments appointed and sent delegates to the Twenty-third Conference held in Washington, 1925, and paid all of their expenses. Some of the groups are officially constituted by their parliaments, and the expenses of their delegates automatically paid.

Leading men of our Congress have associated themselves with the work of the American group from its beginning. Names that come quickly to mind are Champ Clark, John Sharp Williams, John W. Davis, Henry A. Cooper, John F. Shaforth, W. F. Harris, William A. Oldfield, Stephen Porter, John W. Weeks, Lawrence D. Tyson, Elihu Root (still an honorary member of the group), and many others.

Presidents of the American group have been as follows: Richard Bartholdt, of Missouri, 1903–15; James L. Sladen, of Texas, elected February 24, 1915; William McKinley, of Illinois, elected February 24, 1919; Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, elected February 24, 1928; Andrew J. Montague, of Virginia, elected February 24, 1930. Delegates from the American group to the various conferences have invariably included outstanding men of Congress.

A report of the Twenty-ninth Conference, held last October in Madrid, was printed by our permanent executive secretary, who attended the Conference, in the December 1933 number of World Affairs, of which he is editor. I suggest that this brief report, together with the resolutions of the conference, might well be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of the Congress. During the year our permanent executive secretary prepared a pamphlet of some 12 pages entitled "Parliament of Man, a Sketch of the Interparliamentary Union", which was sent to each Member of the Congress.

There are two items to which I would call special attention: First, upon the initiative of Senator BARKLEY last May a resolution unanimously passed the Senate twice, but failed in the House. This resolution, H. R. 5390, read as follows:

"American group of the Interparliamentary Union: Toward the expenses of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, including traveling expenses, subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), compensation for stenographic and other clerical services, printing and binding, and other necessary expenses, fiscal year 1934, $10,000, to be disbursed on vouchers approved by the president and the executive secretary of the American group."

A similar resolution, I hope you will agree, should be passed by the Seventy-third Congress.

Second, I further recommend for your consideration the adoption by the Congress of an authorization act substantially as follows:

"To authorize participation by the United States in the Interparliamentary Union.

"Resolved, etc., That an appropriation not to exceed $20,000 per annum is hereby authorized, $10,000 of which shall be for the contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union for the promotion of the International Arbitration; and $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to assist in meeting the expenses of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union for the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made, such appropriation to be disbursed on vouchers to be approved by the president and the executive secretary of the American group.

"SEC. 2. That the American group of the Interparliamentary Union shall submit to the Congress a report including its expenditures under this appropriation."

Gentlemen, your cooperation with this work is worth while. We are mindful of the onslaughts against parliaments, and yet we of America must believe that ordered liberty is dependent upon representative government. The Interparliamentary Union deserves our support, for it is the world's one organized defense of the parliamentary system and of the modes of democracy which that system continues, fortunately, to represent.

THIRTY-FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA GROUP OF THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

The Thirty-first Annual Meeting of the United States of America Group of the Interparliamentary Union was held in the House Committee Room on Foreign Affairs, Capitol Building, Friday, January 19, 1934, at 11 a. m.

The meeting was called to order by the president, Representative ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, of Virginia.

President MONTAGUE opened the meeting with remarks appearing at the end of this report.

Upon the motion of Mr. BLOOM, seconded by Mr. MCREYNOLDS, it was voted that the president's remarks be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The minutes of the thirtieth annual meeting were read and approved.

The treasurer read his report, as follows:

|---|---|
| Balance on hand last statement | $1,137.43 |
| Received from the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace | 1,000.00 |
| Total | 2,137.43 |
| Paid for secretarial services from Dec. 24, 1932, to Dec. 24, 1933 (12 months) | 600.00 |
| Feb. 12, 1933, Judd & Detweiler, printing | 42.25 |
| July 26, 1933, Judd & Detweiler, printing | 64.50 |
| Aug. 25, 1933, to Arthur D. Call to cover expenses to the Twenty-ninth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union at Madrid | 1,000.00 |

| Jan. 12, 1934: | |
| Judd & Detweiler, printing | 12.50 |
| American Peace Society, telephone, etc | 7.70 |
| Total expenditures | 1,729.20 |
| Balance | 408.23 |

It was voted that the treasurer's report be accepted and filed.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President: Representative Andrew J. Montague, Virginia.

Vice presidents: Senator Simeon D. Fess, Ohio; Senator Alben W. Barkley, Kentucky; Representative Sam D. McReynolds, Tennessee.

Treasurer: Representative Sol Bloom, New York.

Secretary: Representative Charles A. Eaton, New Jersey.

Permanent executive secretary: Arthur Deerin Call.

Executive committee: Representative Andrew J. Montague, ex-officio chairman; Representative Fred A. Britten, Illinois; Representative Albert A. Carter, California; Representative William Bacon Oliver, Alabama; Senator Tom Connally, Texas; Senator Joseph T. Robinson, Arkansas; Senator Millard Tydings, Maryland; Senator Arthur Vandenberg, Michigan; Representative A. Piatt Andrew, Massachusetts; Representative Thomas C. Cochran, Pennsylvania.

It was voted that the proposal to introduce an authorization act for the support of the Interparliamentary Union be laid on the table.

It was voted that the following two proposals be referred to a committee composed of President MONTAGUE and Senator GORE, with the recommendation that every proper effort be made to get these two appropriations adopted by the Congress:

1. That an appropriation of $10,000 be carried for the support of the Interparliamentary Union bureau at Geneva;

2. That an appropriation of $10,000 be carried for the support of the United States of America group of the Interparliamentary Union.

It was announced that the Thirtieth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union is to be held in Istanbul (Constantinople), September 1934.

President MONTAGUE's opening remarks follow this report.

"THE GREEN MOUNTAIN SPIRIT"

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of November of November 9, 1934, entitled "The Green Mountain Spirit", which I am sending to the desk.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GREEN MOUNTAIN SPIRIT

Everyone has been so busy since Tuesday night totting up the number of once sturdy Republican establishments that were swept away by the Roosevelt-Farley avalanche that wholly inadequate notice has been given to the fact that one small but exceedingly valuable edifice still stands unscathed. Of the 6 widely scattered States that returned 2 Republican Senators, there were only 3 that elected no Democratic Representative; and of these Vermont alone chose a Republican governor—though it must be parenthetically remarked that Delaware held no gubernatorial election, and that the victory for North Dakota's Democratic candidate was at least partly due to a revulsion of feeling against the Langer clan.

Republicanism in Vermont is, of course, a habit; but in this particular election that State's repudiation of the new deal, its philosophy and works, was also a matter of choice. Neither the strategists of the Farley machine, who had publicly marked the Green Mountains as a target for their heavy artillery, nor the Republican candidates, left any doubt in any voter's mind that there was a choice to be made. Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN is one of the bitterest critics of the administration's policies in the upper House. His comments on Mr. James Farley's cancelation of the air-mail contracts were telling enough to elicit for Vermont every attention that the Democratic machine, with the Treasury as its war chest, can give a critic's constituency.

From the shipments of free corned beef into communities that had no poor relief rolls up to the strenuous effort that was made to foist a $100,000,000 Public Works project on the State, no device for introducing the mountaineers to bread and circuses was left untried. No disgruntled minority lobby in Montpelier escaped the attentions of Farley's agents, and the State holds no personal enemy of any Republican candidate who was not sought out and comforted.

In the face of this onslaught the strategy of the Republican candidates consisted almost wholly in saying to the voters of Vermont what Senator AUSTIN says of the Roosevelt administration in Washington, the substance of this being that the directorate of the new deal aspires to dictatorship and that growth of its power is a menace to traditional American liberties. Vermont is one corner of this land in which the birthright of personal liberty is not a foggy abstraction which a poor man is glad to trade for a can of corned beef. Because the majority of the Vermonters are the descendants of men and women who went into the savage hills from Connecticut and Massachusetts to escape the Puritan's regimentation of mind, body, and soul, they come honestly by an intelligent as well as rugged individualism with which the kind of State pauperism that Mr. Roosevelt is fostering is wholly incompatible. When the rest of pioneer America's heirs recover as clear a vision, as stiff a backbone, and as much self-respect as the Vermonters have just exhibited, this country will again awake to the proverbial gray dawn that brings the traveler on his way.

ADDRESS BY COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY O'CONNOR

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender the address of the Honorable J. F. T. O'CONNOR, Comptroller of the Currency, delivered over the radio on January 12, 1935, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Permit me to thank you, Judge Collins, and through you the National Democratic Club, for this opportunity to address the citizens of our country. Never in our history have our people been as interested in their Government as they are today. If the people are to draw accurate conclusions concerning their Government, they must be presented with facts on which their conclusions may be based. The citizen counts for little who merely opposes policies or programs which are presented. The valuable citizen is the one who analyzes the weakness in the procedure which he criticizes and suggests a better plan. This Government can only be as strong and responsible as it is made by the citizenship of the Nation.

A comparatively small number of people have an accurate conception of the duties of the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller is appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and his appointment is subject to confirmation by the Senate. The Bureau of the Comptroller of the Currency was established under Abraham Lincoln as a war-time measure, for the purpose of strengthening the financial structure by permitting currency to be issued against the obligations of the Government. At the present time, in addition to his duties in connection with the regulation of currency, the Comptroller issues charters for national banks, examines all national banks, has supervisory and regulatory powers over them, and administers the receiverships when national banks are placed in liquidation. He is the only official designated by Congress to recommend banking legislation. He is also, by virtue of his office, a member of the board of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and an ex-officio member of the Federal Reserve Board.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt has been intensely interested in our banking problems; and it is his magnificent leadership, his enthusiasm, his driving force, coupled with the cooperation of the Congress of the United States, which have made possible the rehabilitation of the collapsed banking structure. That the President felt clearly the Government's responsibility for the restoration of banking activities is made plain in the following statement which he made before the American Bankers' Association on October 24, 1934:

"In its relation with bankers, the purpose of the Government should be threefold. First, to promote the confidence of the people in banks and banking in view of the important service that banks and banking may perform for the people as a whole. Second, to make this confidence a real and living thing by assisting banks to render themselves useful and worthy of this confidence through wise supervision. A third purpose now offers itself, and I wish with all earnestness to press this point tonight. Government should assert its leadership in encouraging not only the confidence of the people in banks but the confidence of the banks in the people. In March 1933 I asked the people of this country to renew their confidence in banks. They took me at my word. Tonight I ask the bankers of this country to renew their confidence in the people of this country. I hope you will take me at my word."

The banks comprise the nervous system of our economic and industrial life. Statistics in the Comptroller's Office prove conclusively that this sensitive structure is on a firmer basis than at any time in our history. Striking progress has been made since the appalling banking holiday of March 1933, when the entire banking system of the Nation was at a standstill. At the conclusion of the holiday, nearly 2 billions of dollars were inaccessible to depositors in 1,417 banks under the Comptroller's jurisdiction, which were not licensed to reopen.

Of these 1,417 banks, 1,089, with deposits of $1,802,285,000, have been reorganized under old or new charters or absorbed by other national banks; 31 have gone into voluntary liquidation and repaid to depositors $11,513,000; and 292, with deposits of $151,540,000, are in receivership. Four of these receivership banks have plans approved for reorganization. There remain undisposed of only 5 of the 1,417 unlicensed banks, with deposits of $6,438,000, or three-tenths of 1 percent of the total deposits in the 1,417 banks, and all 5 have plans approved for reorganization.

During the 12 years from 1921 through 1932, 10,816 banks, with aggregate deposits of $4,885,126,000 failed in the United States. In other words, an average of 901 banks, with average deposits of $407,093,833, failed each year, as compared with 58 failures during 1934. It is a pleasure to report that only 1 of these 58 banks was a national bank whose deposits, amounting to approximately $40,000, were all insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and not a single dollar was lost to a depositor. A second national bank closed on Thursday of this week, due to the activities of a faithless official. There have been 11 insured-bank failures, 6 of which have been caused by dishonest employees.

One of the most important problems now before the Comptroller's Office is to hasten the distribution of additional dividends to depositors in closed banks wherever possible.

On December 31, 1934, there were in receivership 1,551 banks under the Comptroller's jurisdiction, including those which were placed in receivership prior to the banking holiday, with deposits at closing of $1,881,739,524, and provision already had been made for the return to depositors of $1,008,042,159, or more than 53 percent of these funds.

Sixteen hundred applications for loans to receivership banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have been approved and loans in the amount of $369,728,100 have been granted.

In addition, a plan has been worked out between Hon. Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and this Bureau for completing the liquidation of receivership banks which have assets valued at $30,000 or less. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will loan the full amount of the appraised value of the assets to the receiver, less estimated interest and collection charges, take the receiver's note, and hold the assets as collateral. The receiver is then authorized to sell the assets of his trust, subject to the loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to a depositor's committee, for a nominal consideration, whereupon the receiver is instructed to terminate his trust immediately. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will liquidate the assets until the loan has been fully repaid, and any remaining assets will be returned to the depositors' committee, which will complete liquidation in the interest of the depositors. The plan has met with hearty approval in all parts of the country. There are approximately 400 trusts which it is hoped can be disposed of in this manner, and then the plan may be extended.

National-bank receiverships are conducted by the Comptroller's Office with a maximum of efficiency and a minimum of expense. From the date of the first failure of a national bank in 1865 to October 31, 1934, national banks placed in receivership numbered 2,908. Of these, 1,219 had been completely liquidated and their affairs closed. Expenses incident to the administration of these 1,219 closed trusts, such as receiver's salaries, legal, and other expenses amounted to 3.86 percent of the book value of the assets and stock assessments administered, or 7.39 percent of collections from assets and stock assessments. In other words, about 93 cents out of every dollar collected by receivers went to creditors.

The success of efforts at rehabilitation are shown in the following figures: Since the conclusion of the banking holiday on March 16, 1933, the number of active banks under the Comptroller's jurisdiction has increased from 4,522 to 5,483, and deposits in these banks have increased from $16,315,586,000 to $20,907,250,000, representing a gain of 961 active banks and of $4,591,664,000 in deposits. The total deposits in all national banks is closely approaching the total of $23,268,884,000, which was reported for June 30, 1930, and which was the highest total reported for June 30 in the history of the system.

It is with regret that a decrease in the ratio of loans and discounts to deposits is noted. At the time of the call report of October 17, 1934, this ratio was 36.7 percent, as compared with 38.6 percent on June 30, 1934. The ratio increased from 65 percent in 1926 to 68.5 percent in 1929, and there has been a steady decline since 1929. The chief significance of this low ratio is the accumulated store of credit now available to industry. In order for a bank to survive, the money on deposit must be put to work. In order for the merchant to survive, he must sell the goods upon his shelves to make a profit and pay his expenses.

The Comptroller's Office and the national-bank examiners have in some cases been criticized for the failure of the banks to utilize this available credit. Such is not the case. A public office and its incumbent are, by right divine, targets at which the public fires when displeased. When Shakespeare said, "How full of briers is this working-day world", he must have had in mind a man in public office in times of stress. There is a story that when the Czar returned from a trip during which an attempt had been made upon his life, one of his aides remarked upon his calm and undisturbed bearing at the time of the incident. The Czar adjusted his sword, smiled, and said, "Part of my business is to be shot at."

In October 1933 national-bank examiners were instructed to appraise assets on a recovery basis, and these instructions were reinforced by further instructions in March 1934. The reports of examiners on 5,275 banks were carefully analyzed to determine whether instructions had been followed, and some interesting figures were revealed: The total amount of loans was $7,740,596,000; 2.88 percent of these loans were placed in the loss column, 4.19 percent in the doubtful column, and 27.05 percent in the slow column. Please consider the importance of these figures. After one of the greatest, if not the greatest, depressions in the history of our country, the national-bank examiners have placed in the loss column less than 3 percent of all commercial loans made by national banks. That should answer once and for all the criticism that examiners are so drastic that recovery is retarded.

The question of slow paper has probably been discussed more than any of the other classifications. The bankers have been advised of the definition of slow paper and the attitude of this Office toward loans in the slow column as follows: "The items placed in the slow column are merely 'flagged.' In other words, the attention of the bank officials is called to these items with the suggestion that they be watched. No suggestion is conveyed or implied that the borrower should be requested to pay the same. They are therefore considered slow loans. This is our interpretation unless the examiner in his report makes specific criticism of particular items in the slow column."

It is reasonable to expect that in isolated cases an error of judgment will be made in the appraisal of an asset. The remarkable thing is that a banker and an examiner will agree about a million dollars' worth of loans and then the banker will become greatly distressed about some small item.

The following comment appeared editorially in one of the banking magazines:

"Many bank examiners have been classifying as 'poor', paper which later turned out to be good. This was going on at the same time that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other governmental agencies were begging bankers to be more liberal in their loaning policies.

"I was talking last month to the vice president of a good-sized national bank located in the northwestern banker territory and he told me specifically of a case where his bank had a loan of $65,000 on a factory in his city, which loan had been in the bank for 2 years. The manufacturing company employed 200 people, and while it was not building up a very large surplus, it was running in the black and not in the red.

"The national-bank examiner said that the loan should be charged off entirely and put it on the doubtful list, and this, in spite of the fact that in addition to the security of the plant as collateral, that the bank had back of this loan a $2,000,000 trust fund as additional security.

"When the bank examiner was told about the trust-fund collateral, he asked to see a statement of the trust fund and when the banker showed this to him, he said that in view of the fact that none of the stocks or bonds were listed on any of the exchanges he could not ascertain their value and still insisted that the loan be charged off.

"After the bank examiner made his report, the vice president of the bank secured firm bids on three different groups of stocks owned by the corporation and found that these stocks could be sold on the market at this time for $250,000, which certainly was several times more than was necessary to pay off the loan of $65,000. He took this information with him and went to see the 'higher ups', and presented them with the data he had gathered. The chief examiner immediately replaced the loan as 'good'—all of which indicates that bank examiners who have no more comprehension and understanding than this one did in analyzing a loan and the collateral back of it, has no business being a national-bank examiner."

A letter was sent to the editor asking for the name of the examiner and particulars with reference to the loan in question. He replied, "I have written to the bank referred to in my editorial * * * and asked them if they would like to give me the name of the bank examiner who made the examination of their bank * * * but the vice president, with whom I corresponded, felt that he would prefer to leave the matter as it was and not give me the name as everything had been straightened out now with satisfaction to all concerned."

It seems unfair for a bank to make the statement quoted to a newspaper for the purpose of publication, and then, when the official having the responsibility for these examinations attempts to investigate the matter, to have the bank decline to furnish any information. It would lead one strongly to believe that the criticism was not justified in the first instance.

Much has also been said concerning the duplication of examinations of banks and considerable misunderstanding has arisen in this connection. Only two organizations in Washington examine banks at the present time. The Bureau of the Comptroller of the Currency examines all national banks, and no other examiner examines a national bank except upon written agreement between the national bank and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. No one will deny the right of a bank to permit an examination by another agency of the Government. A national bank is examined twice a year. The Federal Reserve Board examines State banks and trust companies which are members of the Federal Reserve System, and may direct a special examination of any member bank.

The law provides that all State banks which make application for insurance shall be solvent. Therefore the only question to be determined by a Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation representative is whether the assets are sufficient to pay the bank's liabilities. To be eligible for insurance the bank need have no capital structure under the existing law, and the Corporation has no visitorial powers.

It is clear, therefore, that the representatives of both the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation are not examiners in the true sense of the word. An examination of a bank implies criticism and suggestions as to its loans, an examination of all of its books and records, including the minutes of the corporation, to determine if all of the provisions of the National Banking Act have been complied with, as well as a determination of the question of solvency. None of these questions is within the jurisdiction of the representatives of either the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

It has long been an established legal principle that banking is a business so affected with a public interest that the most stringent public regulation and control are justifiable. Indeed, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, speaking for the United States Supreme Court in the case of Noble State Bank v. Haskell, said: "We cannot say that the public interests to which we have adverted are not sufficient to warrant the State in taking the whole business of banking under its control. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that it may go on from regulation to prohibition except upon such conditions as it may prescribe." The Court then cited a number of cases from various States in which various types of regulations and prohibitions had been supported. This is a judicial recognition of the economic truth that the soundness of the banking structure of the Nation is intimately interwoven with the welfare of the people, and therefore should and must be made the subject of strict public regulation and control. Regarding the principle itself, there is no dispute; it is only when methods of putting into effect this regulatory power are considered that debate and discussion begin.

A bank has a definite function to perform in the community. If it is not necessary, it cannot thrive, for a bank must earn in order to exist. If from the ordinary and normal operations of a bank in the community it cannot derive a living income, it will be driven to resort to illegal activities or to dip into its reserve, its surplus, and its capital, until it becomes the painful duty of the Comptroller of the Currency to close it. If business men will curb the perfectly normal speculative instinct, if they will not lend their assistance, through local pride or for any other reason, to the organization of banks locally, whether they be State or National banks, without a careful survey of the banking needs of the community, we shall have less failures than we have had in the past.

In order to continue a sound banking structure in the Nation we must have the cooperation of all classes of citizens, the Congress, and the banking authorities of the several States. Applications for any charter should receive the most careful consideration, and a charter should be granted only where the bank shows an adequate, sound capital, and where there is a real necessity for further banking facilities and a favorable prospect for the bank's successful operation.

Banks should not be chartered because of irrational optimism or personal pride or jealousies. These are dangerous methods of expressing one's individualism. A picture of the banking graveyard of the yesterdays, if kept vividly before us, will deter improper or unwise action in the future.

Judging from the correspondence which comes to my desk, it seems that a large part of the people have suggestions for banking reforms, currency reforms, credit expansion and curtailment. Some believe no money should be issued, while others believe that every citizen should be furnished with sufficient money to provide for all reasonable needs. You will recall the attempt of the famous Jack Cade to launch and lead a proletarian revolution in England, and you may remember the words which Shakespeare put in his mouth more than 300 years ago: "There shall be no money; all shall eat and drink on my score; and I will apparel them all in one livery, that they may agree like brothers and worship me, their lord." The dream that there shall be no money has not been realized either in the land of Shakespearean characters or of Uncle Sam, or in any other civilized country on the globe. The accomplishment of the purpose stated by the dreamer was to be brought about not only by the abolition of money and money lenders, but also through the proposal: "First thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers." That was Jack Cade's idea of bringing about a revolution and establishing a financial and industrial despotism under the control of the proletariat, with himself at the top, 3 centuries ago.

In 1917 Nikalai Lenin announced as an objective of the revolution in Russia "the union of all banks into one single national bank * * * control of the council of workers-delegates over the banks * * * and then toward their nationalization * * * their passing over into the possession of the whole people." Again he stated that they must "move steadily toward a transformation of the banks into centers of social bookkeeping under socialism * * *." That is to say, the one national bank would not be a bank at all, but a place where social accounts were kept. Money, as we understand its function, would be gone, under his system, as well as under the plan of Jack Cade.

Let us not lose the ground already gained. When we are asked to travel unknown seas, let us determine if others have met with disaster on their journey. No teacher can be substituted for experience. While we must avoid the disasters of the past, we should not oppose every effort to solve new problems in new ways. There has been no guide for many of the problems which have confronted our people during the past few years. Bold, aggressive, and decisive leadership has pointed to new solutions. The battle is being won. We are within sight of the last stronghold of the depression. With continued faith in our fearless leader, 120 millions of people are marching forward in unbroken lines, confident of the result, and with exaltation in their hearts.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED AND NOMINATIONS WITHDRAWN

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States, submitting four treaties, a convention, and several nominations, and withdrawing nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees or ordered to lie on the table.

(For nominations this day received and withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RESERVATION TO WORLD COURT RESOLUTION OF ADHERENCE

Mr. NORRIS submitted a reservation intended to be proposed by him to the resolution of adherence on the part of the United States to the World Court protocols, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of George Fried, of New York, now holding recess appointment, to the position of supervising inspector, Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Coast Guard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

THE WORLD COURT

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive A (71st Cong., 3d sess.), protocols concerning adherence of the United States to the Court of International Justice, the pending question being the amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG to the resolution of adherence, as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(Mr. LONG resumed and concluded his speech, which entire is as follows:)

AMERICA FOR SALE

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, there is a most amazing news report coming out of Geneva this morning in connection with the stand that has been taken there by the League of Nations. It comes at a very striking period in the deliberations of this body, when we are considering the World Court. When the document which appears on the front page of the particular paper which I now have before me, the New York Times, is read in connection with a document that is published today in the Washington Herald, and when it is read in the light of the effort to secure ratification of the agreement for entry into the World Court, it suggests to me that it ought to have the caption "America for Sale."

We have had the Monroe Doctrine in effect in this country for more than a hundred years, by which America said to all foreign countries, "Stay out of Central and South America, and North America, too." Under the Monroe Doctrine America took it upon itself to act more or less as an unofficial umpire to preserve peace in South America. Under the Monroe Doctrine, and by and with the consent of the people of South America, along in the seventies, about 1878, the United States undertook to adjust disputes then prevailing in South America between Paraguay and Argentina and other countries over a territory known as the "Chaco."

In the year 1878 President Hayes was agreed upon by the Republics of Argentina and Paraguay to act as mediator and as conciliator to settle the dispute existing at that time because of the situation in Paraguay and Argentina, in which some other countries were involved. Mr. Hayes appointed a commission, which made a most intensive study of the affairs and conditions in the Chaco district, and the award designated and fixed the borders of Paraguay, the borders of Argentina, and the borders of the Chaco territory, which belonged to Paraguay and which belonged to Argentina.

Immediately thereafter a delegation from Bolivia was sent to the Republic of Paraguay to congratulate them upon the peaceful solution of the war which had prevailed theretofore between Argentina and Paraguay and to assure them of their assistance in maintaining the boundaries which had been fixed by President Hayes in the award of 1878.

Notwithstanding the fact that America, acting through its President as mediator, settled these boundaries, fixed the status of the parties, called off the war, and under the Monroe Doctrine held the European nations from interfering or meddling with that war one way or the other; notwithstanding the fact that the award of 1878 was officially published and recognized, as shown by a map published by the Republic of Bolivia itself, which I have here before me; notwithstanding the settlement made by America, notwithstanding the recognition of the award by Argentina, by Bolivia, by Paraguay, and by every other country; notwithstanding the settlement and award made in 1878 stood for a period of nearly 60 years, yet the time came that oil was discovered in the region of Chaco and the Standard Oil Co. of the United States wanted to provoke a war to claim a territory for the Standard Oil Co. through the Bolivian Government, contrary to the lines fixed in the award made by the President of the United States. We now find them trying to do it through the League of Nations.

Here is a remarkable situation. What did America do with the Monroe Doctrine under Mr. Hoover and under Mr. Roosevelt? Both of them, like Tweedledum and Tweedledee, let the Standard Oil Co. finance a revolution against Paraguay carried on by the Bolivian Government. Bolivia, without there being the slightest effort from any other source to prevent it, laid claim to what? To the territory included in the Hayes award, included within the boundary limits established by the President of the United States, the recognition of which had been compelled from every country down there and which had stood for a period of 60 years until oil was discovered in the Chaco or on the borders of the Chaco.

Then broke out the Bolivian-Paraguayan War, and the United States stayed out. How long did the United States stay out? We stayed out long enough they thought for Bolivia to have time to whip Paraguay, but actually they did not do it. We apparently took the position there was not going to be much to the war. The Bolivians were going to wipe the Paraguayans off the face of the earth, we were all led to understand. To assist in carrying on the war, the Standard Oil Co. had dealt forth millions and millions of dollars—and not only had they dealt forth millions and millions of dollars to finance the war, but the State Department of the United States under Mr. Hoover considered and approved, in violation of the law, of a bond issue being floated in this country for some twenty-odd million dollars, $5,000,000 of which was to go to Vickers & Co. to pay for munitions that were being made for Bolivia at the time. I have here the hearings and the testimony to prove this statement in case any Senator might desire to see them. Thereupon the war began to progress between Bolivia and Paraguay. But Bolivia, with all the help that was rendered, was unable to defeat the Paraguayan Army.

While I was speaking here one afternoon last year my friend from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], in carrying on the good work he has done for this country, asked that I yield in order that the Senate might immediately consider and pass a bill to prohibit arms being exported from the United States either to Paraguay or Bolivia in order that war might be stopped. What was the result? A few days later, the bill having been passed without objection that afternoon, the Bolivian Army began to ship arms as though no law had ever been enacted by the Congress prohibiting it. Upon inquiry, we were given to understand that the Bolivian Government, or those selling munitions to the Bolivian Government, had asked whether the new law enacted by Congress would prohibit the shipment of arms to Bolivia which had already been purchased in the United States before the law was enacted.

The Department of Justice gave out one of these Mother Hubbard opinions, in which it said that was a case for the courts to decide and not for the Department of Justice to decide. Thereupon the Bolivian Government and friends of Bolivia were informed that before the law was passed, and not expecting that kind of legislation, they had made contracts for the purchase of war supplies from various and sundry concerns scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and under the retiring position taken by the Department of Justice the shipments proceeded to Bolivia ad libitum.

Now, however, even with all that being done, the Paraguayan armies have been victorious, so what do we see? The United States remained silent, the United States refused to enforce the mandate of the award made by the United States in 1878. Here was the United States Government unfurling the Stars and Stripes, claiming to be the land of the free and the home of the brave, claiming to be the protector of Central America and South America, the mediator and conciliator which established the bounds and settled the disputes between Paraguay and Bolivia—here was the United States with the award of settlement of the territorial dispute which had been recognized by all the countries for a period of 60 years, but none the less it let Paraguay and Bolivia fight down there month after month and year after year, with Bolivia receiving the financial help of the Standard Oil Co., the United States paying no attention whatever that the war was being carried on against Paraguay, according to a statement made by the Bolivian Government, because Bolivia had decided that it would not recognize any further the territorial boundaries fixed by the award made by the President of the United States.

That is what Bolivia said. Bolivia said that after a period of 60 years they had come to the conclusion that they would no longer recognize the award that had been made by the President of the United States. The then President of the United States remained supinely silent, and his successor remains in the same position up to the present day and date.

So now the United States could not act, Mr. President. The only thing the United States could have done, if the United States had acted, would have been to say, "Why, we have made an award. We cannot mediate a dispute that was settled 60 years ago." That is all the United States could have said. The United States could not have said, "We shall have to have another mediation over whether or not the mediation we made 60 years ago is true and correct." So the United States was in a suspended condition, where it could not do anything. So what do we do? What becomes of the Monroe Doctrine?

Well, here steps up the League of Nations:

League supports first punitive step to curb Paraguay.

Is not that remarkable? The League of Nations has announced from The Hague that inasmuch as the award of Rutherford B. Hayes, made in 1878, still stands; inasmuch as Bolivia has recognized it for 60 years and Argentina for 60 years; and inasmuch as the Bolivian Army, financed by the Standard Oil Co., has been unable to dislodge the Paraguayans from the territory given to them by the United States through the award of the President, the "League supports first punitive step to curb Paraguay."

Second headline:

Assembly's Chaco group votes unanimously—

Note that—votes unanimously for end of arms embargo on Bolivia.

They voted just as unanimously on that proposition which had the signature of the United States as they did on the payment of the war debts. They unanimously voted not to pay the United States the $11,000,000,000 of war debts, and now they have unanimously voted not to pay any attention to the award made by the President of the United States in 1878.

So, Mr. President, we are getting somewhere now. We have managed to take the Monroe Doctrine and throw that in the brush heap; we have managed to take $11,000,000,000 of the people's money and throw that into the brush heap; and, if things keep going along pretty well, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH in the chair] will get a message from The Hague telling him whether or not he can run for the United States Senate 4 years from now. [Laughter.]

A little bit more:

Hints of stronger move—

Here are the European nations hinting of a stronger move against Paraguay if they do not abandon the territory awarded to them by the United States. Not only have they lifted the embargo, but here is the League of Nations hinting a move, I should take it at least of assistance, at least as a party belligerent in some capacity. However that may be, I am not in a position to say, nor is anyone else, probably at this time; but, inasmuch as the Paraguayans have not been dislodged from the territory that was awarded to them through the conciliator—the President of the United States—in 1878, here is a hint from the League of Nations that now, since Paraguay refuses to yield on this award the League of Nations is going to lift the embargo against Bolivia and that they will take more drastic steps as the circumstances may require with The Hague as the base of their operations—

Committee awaits Asuncion's compliance by February 24 with peace proposals.

That is a remarkable doctrine. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it, but at the conclusion of my remarks I shall ask leave to have this entire article printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator is reading from the New York Times, I believe. I did not hear the early part of his remarks. A correspondent of mine writes to me as follows:

The New York Times of February 24, 1932, frankly tells us Britain will oppose boycott by League. France also is expected to bar Geneva efforts to punish Japan * * *. That is the definite policy of the British Government * * * regardless of assurance that this country, as a member of the League, will abide by its decision.

I have not the entire article, but what I have read shows that the millennium has not yet come so far as the larger and stronger nations are concerned when the League undertakes to settle these questions. Its efforts are nearly always confined to the weaker nations.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator for this document. That is not amazing, however. Before I send the document to the desk I want to look at it. There was a time when this document would have been amazing, but it is no longer amazing. It calls back to my mind the exact fact as the Senator from Georgia has just so well stated it.

When Japan defied the League and told them to go to hell, that Japan would do nothing of the kind proposed by the League, they withdrew, and the Japanese Ambassador who had been sent to the League of Nations paid us a visit on his way home in order to give us to understand where we could go, so that nobody would have any doubt about it.

We were not members of the League of Nations. So, after telling the League of Nations that Japan would pay it no mind at all, the gentleman who was representing Japan in the League of Nations at The Hague took a boat and came to the United States and told us where we could go, then crossed the United States and went on his way home, and we never heard a word about it. On the contrary, as this report will show, the United States undertook to get some action through the League.

Mr. Stimson called upon France and upon Great Britain to stand up for the honor of the League's agreements and the League's demands and the League's contracts on the matter. What happened? They said, "No, no; the League will in no event ever raise its hand in a punitive way to call Japan to account because they have broken the contract in their Manchurian aggression." They went and took one hunk of China, then took another hunk of China, took the entire Manchurian territory, set up a government of their own thereon, and whipped the Chinese armies, contrary to their League, contrary to their peace treaty, contrary to the Kellogg Pact. They did not even undertake to justify it; and then said the League, "Oh, no; we will make no aggression against Japan. Let them go ahead. The League is not set up for punitive purposes."

But, the League is today set up for punitive purposes; and the only time it has raised its hand is against the little country of Paraguay because Paraguay refuses to surrender the territory awarded to it by the United States. The United States sits here with the Monroe Doctrine scrapped, and a message comes to hurry and get into the next thing, the World Court, because we are going to have a war over in Europe, and if we do not hurry up and get in the World Court, we will not be a party to it.

Why the difference? Well, one little illuminating paragraph from this article explains the difference. Over on page 14 of this issue of the New York Times of January 17 there is just one little paragraph that they let in. The League will probably cut that out of the next report. It says here:

It remains to be seen whether the embargo will be really tightened. Some fear the move comes too late and that by February 24 Paraguay will already have the oil fields.

Now remember that. There is apprehension expressed over in the League that maybe they have made the move against Paraguay too late to keep the oil fields in the hands of the Standard Oil Co. of the United States. There is great fear that the deliverance of this country from the hands of the United States proper has probably made its appearance too late to save the particular territory that the Standard Oil Co. has from being taken before February 24.

That brings us to inquire, Who is the moving spirit behind the World Court in America today? The President may think he is, but we have had Presidents before him who thought they were, all of them. We had them from Roosevelt back through Mr. Hoover, back through Mr. Coolidge, back through Mr. Harding, and back even to Woodrow Wilson. Who is the one that has kept the light afire for the League of Nations? I do not know how much they have spent, but I am told that the Rockefeller fortune has been the one great bulwark that has kept the fires lighted for the League of Nations in America. I am told that there are news reports—I have this only second-hand; probably before the day is over I shall have some of them that will be supplied to me by some of my friends in this body—I am told that the news reports of the past year say that the Rockefellers have kept circulating, through millions and millions of dollars in contributions, these elegantly printed, leather-covered volumes that go out to the ministers of the gospel and the principals of the schools, that go hither and thither day by day and year after year in this great move for peace. I am told that the millions of dollars that have found their way for the payment of this propaganda came through the hands of the Rockefellers.

Why would not that be the case? The Rockefellers were never known to give a dime for which they did not get back a $10 bill. Why would it not be true? Every time the League of Nations has been called upon to render service to the Rockefellers the League of Nations has always responded. Here it is—a grant that has been awarded and recognized by the President of the United States and by all the Presidents of the United States since 1878. Here is an award and a grant that has been made by the United States and been recognized and enforced by the Congress of the United States since 1878. Here is an agreement that has been recognized by the official map published by Bolivia, by the delegations of Bolivia, and by all the countries of South and Central America since 1878. Here are boundaries and properties protected under the Monroe Doctrine of the United States of America that belong as much to Paraguay as any farmer ever owned the ground that he tilled. The only way by which this aggression could be justified under any kind of sanction of authority was through the League of Nations. So the Monroe Doctrine was scrapped, and lo and behold, the shadow of Rockefeller appears on the scene from the League of Nations, appears from The Hague. Out comes the demand—it ought to have been signed by the Rockefellers instead of by the League of Nations—to the Paraguayan Government, "Touch not the soil upon which we have located these oil mines. Transgress no further to the point where you may seize the property given to you by the award of the United States Government and through the signatories of the combined powers of South America. Touch not that given to you by law. We finance the League of Nations propaganda in the United States; and the League demands the Monroe Doctrine and treaties and awards of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding that, the anointed must not be molested in the aggressions and claims that it has made through Bolivia, one of the powers that recognized the Hayes award of 1878." And the United States stands here retiring, ignominious, disgraced in its light and by its own performances, the faith of the fathers thrown to the demnition bowwows of eternity, in order that aggressions of this kind may be pursued under the protocols of the League of Nations.

There is another reason why this was done. There was a time when this World Court and League of Nations propaganda was not so well understood as it is now getting to be. There was a time when aggressions of this kind were carried on out of the United States. New Orleans, La., was the base—my home city. They had what they called these great expeditions of soldiers of fortune sent out by the Standard Oil Co. and by the United Fruit Co. and the Cuyamel Lines, run by Mr. Murray, who later merged his properties with the United Fruit Co., and became the directing manager of that particular amalgamated enterprise. During that time they carried out these aggressions against South America and Central America out of New Orleans. Some of those soldiers' names became more or less heralded from pillar to post, as though they were a halo of romance and excitement about them. What did they do? The companies fitted out boat after boat and ship after ship that were to go to Central America and to South America to get the fruit lands of that territory before they learned it was very good for oil, and they sent forth these brave and masterful men, armed to the teeth with the guns, ammunition, and various and sundry mechanisms and appliances for war, paid for by the United Fruit Co. and by the Cuyamel Co. and by the Standard Oil Co., and those men performed the very brave and dangerous task of going up to a little farm where there would be four or five South American laborers and their wives and children, and with their shotguns and their grenades they would kill them and take their 200 acres. Then they would go a while without molesting anyone, and then they would go to another farm, where 40 or 50 of those poor natives would be grubbing out a living from the ground by their steady work from early morn till night, and they would shoot those 40 or 50 laborers and take the land. Then they would go in and buy up some little provincial man who might control a little section. That went on and on until they would get an army and create revolutions, and they would buy out those that they could buy out, and those they could not buy out they would run out, like they did old Zelaya. And then they went down to the other countries and took them over.

But in the year 1930, or 1929, the State of Louisiana spoke up on that matter. They had to run these revolutionists out of New Orleans. And so the State of Louisiana spoke up on the matter, and the State of Louisiana posted watchers and guards to see that New Orleans and the Barataria country would not be the basis for the pillage that they were conducting upon those defenseless people in Central America and South America.

Did they stop with that? Even after that they undertook to carry on some of their aggressions, but it was entirely too difficult for them to do, because in the United States Congress the welkin had begun to ring against this kind of outrage being conducted against Central America and South America. Therefore they had to go to another shore. They had to cross the Atlantic Ocean for a space of 3,000 miles. They had to go to The Hague. They had to set up there in foreign soil the one tribunal under which there would be the guise of propriety and legality to conduct these aggressions against Central and South American countries even in the face of the awards made by the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I had not intended to confine what I had to say to the World Court or to the League of Nations or to Paraguay and Bolivia, and do not intend to now. I am speaking under the broader heading, "America for Sale."

Well, a little more evidence comes to light. Mr. Norman Davis seems to be getting along a little bit better than we thought he was. Norman is a smart boy. He is what we call our roving ambassador over in Europe. He has general authority to represent the American Government. There was a time when the United States Senate had something to do with foreign affairs, but that has long been past, and we can just write a letter to this World Court to tell them that we have nothing to do with it. It does not seem that it is necessary to pass the World Court through the Senate, for it was said long ago that the Senate would have nothing to do with foreign affairs. Some Senators have not found it out and some do not know any better than to think they have something to do with it, but that has been done away with long ago. But this World Court proposal is just an announcement to the world that the Senate does not have anything to do with it. However, I refer to it for fear that some back in the grammar schools have not found out what we found out several months ago.

So, Mr. President, we have Mr. Norman Davis as a sort of a United States Senate-plus over there, and he writes out a treaty at midnight, or in the morning as the case may be, so as to simplify these contacts and make them more certain. So Norman Davis is over there. Just about the time they got him over there they found his name on the preferred list of Morgan & Co., or Kuhn, Loeb & Co., I think it was, where he was one of those buying stock at $40 a share and selling it to the public at $65 or perhaps $80 a share. That did not make any difference to Norman. He is the kind of man they wanted. All the undertakings to slander Mr. Davis fell to the ground because it was developed that he was really one of the men on the inside, and did he not get stock at 40 and slip out and sell it back to American suckers at 80? That is the kind of man we wanted. We did not want the kind of man whose corns they could shave off his feet without unlacing his shoes. We wanted a real slick one over there who knew his business, and so we sent Norman over there. And Norman has been over there ever since.

Now, they are trying to disgrace Norman Davis' activities. They are saying that he is over there making an agreement by which he is going to prevent matches from being manufactured in the United States for a consideration of a little mere pittance of $75,000 a year, which he is drawing as a salary. Well, what is a man going to do for $75,000? Is it expected that he will do nothing? I resent the idea that he is not getting more than $75,000; they may have found out that he is getting that much, but if he is not getting more than that it is a slander on him.

So, Mr. President, a report comes out about Mr. Davis—the United States Senate-plus, that we have put over in Europe to regulate matters for the United States Government. Here is the charge——

(At this point Mr. LONG yielded to permit the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States and for the transaction of other business, which appear under the appropriate headings.)

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, just preceding the time when Mr. Davis was making his sojourn in Europe, as has been previously mentioned by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], trouble arose over the Manchurian dispute. Now we are being told that the World Court is one of these great "hands-across-the-sea movements", spreading good will among men. Did the Kellogg-Briand Pact make for good will among men? Did the League of Nations make for good will among men? Did the four-power pact make for good will among men? Did we not have that clatter about "hands across the sea", extended for friendship, to end war under the four-power treaty and the League of Nations and the Kellogg-Briand Pact? What happened when nations violated any one of them? When Japan ran out and withdrew from the League of Nations and took Manchuria away from China, America made its protest through the Republican Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, backed up by Mr. Hoover, backed up by this side of the aisle. What happened? Lo and behold, England backed off and refused to defend the treaty; England refused even to give it moral support; and, lo and behold, when Japan had taken Manchuria, up bobbed an agreement, a peace treaty, if you want to call it that, but a trade treaty, in realty, by which England had contracted with Japan's Manchurian government for a certain percentage of the trade which Manchuria afforded. They had sold out before they started.

Somebody spoke about America "sponging" on the World Court. Here they have a World Court sitting over in Geneva, and it is said the other countries are paying all the expenses and America is not contributing any money to it. But, lo and behold, we have loaned them $11,000,000,000, and they will not even pay the interest on the $11,000,000,000. We say, "That is nothing to us." They have gone in and made a trade agreement in violation of the peace pact, in violation of all the pacts to end war, and we say, "There is nothing to that." They come along here and undertake to take over the Monroe Doctrine, and the United States Senate is called here to give them jurisdiction over the Monroe Doctrine, and we say, "There is nothing to that."

Talk about being a sponger! There never was on the face of the living earth anything to compare with the silence this country has assumed, and the power to accept and receive punishment in allowing them to ignore all debts, ignore all treaties, enter into trade agreements with people who have undertaken to upset them and actually have upset them.

All the while we have two forms of government in the United States—yes, we have three forms of government. We have the Federal Government, the State government, and the municipal government. Those are our three forms of government. The Federal Government comes first, the State government comes next, and the municipal government comes third. But, Mr. President, in reality we have four forms of government. We have the municipal government on the bottom, the State government on the next rung up the ladder, the Federal Government the next rung up the ladder, and above all that we have the Standard Oil Co. and the Rockefellers with their internationalism which they have been able to hang over here when they were not controlling the Government direct.

Regulate them? They never have been regulated by this Government. Law after law has been enacted by the States and by the United States; the Standard Oil has never paid any attention to them. Let us see if I am stating what is correct about this. I said the Standard Oil government was above the Government of the United States and actually controls the United States Government in the matter of foreign treaties and domestic matters. Now, I shall prove it, if anybody wants to hear the proof.

When that war was started between Paraguay and Bolivia a message was submitted to the congress of Bolivia. I have here the message of President Sajamanca to the Congress of Bolivia in the year 1932. Here is a message from the Bolivian President to his own congress:

> It is only sufficient to mention one case at this moment. Bolivia has on the eastern side of her mountains great petroliferous riches of various wells already drilled and exploitation may be entered into immediately. There is urgent need of these resources and we are now obliged to look upon them as valueless. Bolivia cannot move this petroleum to the Argentine because that country, in view of its interests, has closed the outlet with high protective tariffs.

He said in effect, "We cannot go through the Argentine with this oil that we have to take to deep water; we cannot go through Argentina because Argentina is too big a country for us to invade and it has a high protective tariff against us." Then he continued with his message:

> The natural and logical remedy would be to construct a pipe line to the Paraguay River.

Who will construct this pipe line? The Standard Oil Co. of the United States is going to construct it. It is the Standard Oil Co. that drilled the wells. It is the Standard Oil Co. that owns the wells. It is the Standard Oil Co. that defied the other treaties, and it is the Standard Oil Co. that is going to construct the pipe line.

Continuing the President of Bolivia said:

> But there lies the Republic of Paraguay disputing the territories of Bolivia, and also closing the pass.

No one had ever heard of Bolivia's claiming that territory until this famous message was delivered by the President of the Republic of Bolivia to the Congress of Bolivia in which he said:

> We cannot get the oil to the sea even though we have invaded a part of the Chaco territory ourselves. The only way we can get the oil to the sea is through Paraguay.

His message concluded in these words:

> Bolivia cannot resign to live miserably as a country isolated from the world and she must look for the conditions that are necessary to secure the fullness of life.

What was this route that was going to give her a pipe line to the Paraguay River? I have a map here printed on page 10809 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 8, 1934, Seventy-third Congress, which I placed in the RECORD myself. It is not a map drawn by some designer in Paraguay. It is not a map designed by some agent of Paraguay. It is a map which was officially promulgated by the Republic of Bolivia itself in the year 1848. That map shows that long before the war ever came up with Argentina, Bolivia conceded this territory to Paraguay. The map shows that in order for Bolivia to get to the River Paraguay they have to go through the territory awarded by the President of the United States to the Republic of Paraguay. Apparently they have no misgivings about it because the President of Bolivia in his message said, "We cannot whip Argentina because she is too big to attack; therefore, we will wipe little Paraguay off the map and send this pipe line down to the river, which is the first deep water available."

Is it necessary for me to say more about what the League of Nations is being used for? If so, I will give the Senate some news dispatches which were published about the time of the award. Almost coinciding with the Chaco concession, Bolivia sent to Paraguay a plenipotentiary, a gentleman named "Quijerro." He was sent there on September 25, 1879, with these categorical instructions: "Recognize the validity of the President Hayes award." Quijerro presented his credentials to Paraguay, swearing he was bringing the loyal word of Bolivia. He carried out his mandate, recognizing in the treaty he signed "the rights of Paraguay to the south of the Apa parallel", and undoubtedly more than was contained in the award of President Hayes, and "accepting that Paraguay renounce in favor of Bolivia the higher zone." No higher evidence could possibly have been had than the confession of Bolivia herself.

But along comes the League of Nations, growing increasingly bold. Word has reached England that we have declined to become excited when they would not stand by the four-power pact and the Kellogg Treaty and the League of Nations in the Manchurian controversy when Japan took that territory. Now that it has been recognized throughout these European countries not only that they decline to recognize those pacts and stand by America, but that they have actually entered into trade agreements so they may have part of the spoils taken by Japan as the result of breaking those treaties; now that they have refused to pay the debts due to the United States or the interest on the debts that they owe to the United States; now that Great Britain, France, and the balance of them have reduced their own taxes and balanced their own budgets while at the same time seeing the United States increase its taxes and increase its deficit, piling up its debts, and unable to balance its Budget; now that England and those countries sit over there, the debtor nations, sharing in the profits of their own infidelity to the treaties to which they were parties; now that they sit over there enjoying the interest and the principal of the money that they owe us; now that they sit over there after having thus defied every covenant and obligation due and owed to the people of the United States, they have grown increasingly bold. They have said, "With all we have done, with all we have renounced, with all we refused to support, with our signed and plighted word of honor"—if they ever had one—"with all that has been done, still word comes that America is about ready to come into the World Court." Therefore they grow increasingly bold. They cannot wait. They undertook, no doubt, to wait before making this fight to save the oil fields that belong to Paraguay for the ownership of the Standard Oil Co., but there was no time to waste.

They had to hurry, hurry, hurry. "There is no danger," they said. "We have the United States Senate hog-tied. We are going to jam down their throats the World Court. Within another 2 months we will have a tribunal over here rendering decisions on what we are going to allow them to do even among their own States, let alone what they are going to do as between other countries." So they grew courageous as a result of it and sent word down to little Paraguay that they should step back and relinquish what had been granted to them by the United States and held by them ever since with the consent of their neighbors and all foreign countries, or else the League is going to take steps by which to punish this South American country, the Monroe Doctrine and the protocols of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

I say it is a betrayal of America, it is a betrayal of honor, it is a betrayal of everything we have ever had to stand here and without protest witness what has occurred under these circumstances.

Someone has said that I should offer again for the RECORD the proof that the Standard Oil Co. was backing up the war down there for Bolivia. That is in the RECORD already, Mr. President. I now refer to the data which I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when I was here in the Seventy-third Congress. It will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 8, 1934, beginning at page 10808, including a map of Bolivia published in the year 1848, set forth as exhibit Z, on page 10809.

Also, I have previously submitted this matter to the Senate in another speech that was made here on the subject. I do not know whether I have that citation or not; but, at any rate, the data I have referred to here are all contained in the documents I offered here in the speech made on June 7 and June 8. The entire data, I think, will be found in this article.

Now, something else has occurred. There is a contract between the Standard Oil Co. and Bolivia as to the price which Bolivia is supposed to pay for gasoline. They specify that during the time Bolivia is conducting war, Bolivia will pay 11 cents for gasoline, and that when Bolivia is not in war, Bolivia will pay 14 cents for gasoline. In other words, it is understood that the Standard Oil Co. is sharing in the war directly, so that it makes a differential of 3 cents during the time that the war is going on.

That has also come to light lately. I can, in a very short time, secure the data to prove that.

Now we come back to the League of Nations. No longer is America to have its relations under the Monroe Doctrine with the South and Central American countries; and I do not care what is contained in any of these reservations. I do not care what the agreement of the World Court or League of Nations says. I know that when we go into the Court, and go into the League, we are going to sit there with a right to withdraw, and that the day we withdraw we will stamp upon ourselves practically the picture that we have violated what we knew to be the principles of right, or we would not have left there. In other words, the day that we say we are unwilling to have our controversies passed on by these other nations that we were originally willing to have sit in and adjudicate these claims and rights of ours—the day that we withdraw—we the same as say that we knew they were going to decide against us, or we would not have withdrawn from the Court.

But even forgetting that particular claim, there is still a greater point, and that is that the League has a right to enforce its mandates, and already we have a particular case presented where the League is assuming jurisdiction over a dispute that has already been adjudicated and settled by the United States Government. The League is assuming jurisdiction over the boundaries and over the territory of the Chaco, between Paraguay, Bolivia, and Argentina, notwithstanding the fact that the United States Government was the mediator in 1878 and settled that dispute, and Argentina agreed to it, Bolivia agreed to it, Paraguay agreed to it, and the United States promulgated it. It has been accepted without a dispute for a period of 60 years. Notwithstanding that fact, when Bolivia, acting for the Standard Oil Co., of the United States, decides that she wishes to take territory that has already been awarded to Paraguay in this pronouncement that has been issued over the seal and signature of the President of the United States, what does she do?

She does not come to the American Congress. The Standard Oil Co. does not come to the American Congress. The Standard Oil Co. itself went to the League of Nations in the name of the Standard Oil Co.; not only in the guise of Bolivia, but Mr. Walter C. Teagle, the president of the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, filed a complaint or filed some kind of a defense with the League of Nations himself, getting away from the United States. Oh, no; he was not addressing the President of the United States, because, under our theory of the law that "the king never dies", the President of the United States 60 years before that time had adjudicated this matter. Mr. Teagle did not file this document with the State Department, because the State Department of the United States 60 years before that time had awarded this territory to Paraguay. He did not undertake to do that, nor did Bolivia undertake to do that. Bolivia never asked for a reopening of the case after its recognition of the award for a period of 60 years—oh, no! They went across the water 3,000 miles to an institution more under the control of the Rockefellers than anything in the United States—and that is saying a whole lot.

I want to tell you that when they recognized that they had a bigger pull with the League of Nations than they had with the United States, that was making a pretty strong assertion right there; but at least they could not give the color to it. They could never give the color to it, because the United States could not stamp its own award with death. It has been there for 60 years, and Paraguay and Bolivia and Argentina had accepted it, and had agreed to it. So they went a distance of 3,000 miles across the deep, blue Atlantic Ocean, and there they invoked the League of Nations that is now putting us in its little side office, the World Court.

The only difference between the League of Nations and the World Court is about the difference that I used to have in my home when the preacher came there for dinner. At dinner time, when they brought the preacher and some of the deacons and some singer or somebody who had come from out of town, they would put us youngsters back in the kitchen to eat somewhere around the cookstove instead of eating in the main dining room. This World Court that we are going to sit in is simply a little back anteroom they are letting us eat in instead of the main dining hall; that is all.

So now that they are going to put the United States in the World Court, in this little anteroom of the League of Nations over there, until the preacher gets through and leaves, they are going to start out in advance, even before we have gone in there in an official way, and they are going to adjudicate with a pronouncement and a decision of this particular League on whether or not the award made by the President of the United States in 1878 under the Monroe Doctrine is going to stand!

I do not hear anybody on this side of the aisle saying that we ought to stand up for the Monroe Doctrine any more. They are all ready to abdicate—anything to get out of the way. Mr. Norman Davis has already taken over the functions of the United States Senate in foreign lands. He writes them out a receipt over there just like a drummer would accept payment of a bill. Instead of coming here to get ratification for a treaty, they have got old Norman Davis over there giving them a prescription and filling the prescription himself, just like a country pill-bag doctor used to go along and give his patients the remedy he thought they ought to have; but Norman has to be paid, you know. Norman does not work for nothing. [Laughter.]

To come back now to the case of Mr. Norman Davis; he is a nice fellow. He does not make the United States pay it all, if this man is telling the truth in this article—and I think he is telling the truth. I do not think he knows half what the facts are; that is, I think he just got on to a little of it, that he has had to raise a cry of alarm because he is about to be put out of business. The Washington Herald story of January 17 says this—this is the statement of President J. H. Weaver, of the Columbia Match Co., of Cleveland, who is now in Washington to defend the American match industry.

You know, it is almost a crime for a man to come here to defend any American industry. It stamps him with the tarnish of something that is indelibly sinful, and, of course, he must stand that tarnish. Any time a man is caught coming here to this Capital City representing the rights of any American interest as opposed to the interest of some foreign power, he should be indelibly stamped prima facie as a man to be watched. So naturally we shall have to put a deathwatch over this man and take whatever he says with a grain of salt, by reason of the fact that he has no better sense than to think that the people of the United States ought to be allowed to manufacture and sell some of these matches that are used in the United States. A man here at the present day and time advocating that kind of riotous public policy, the right of the manufacturers of the United States to sell the things used in the United States, comes here with suspicion; and I only read this article in that light.

Here is what this man says:

I charged to the White House.

I wonder if Brother Farley was up there to get this message. [Laughter.] At that, he is not half as bad as some of the balance of them that they have up there. I will make that much defense for him. This morning one of my colleagues in this body raced by here and he said, "You know, Farley did get himself in the hands of a terrible set down there in Louisiana—an awful rotten set." I said, "Yes; it was an awful rotten set, but they were a whole lot better then than they have been since they got into Farley's hands." [Laughter.] What we resent is that they have not learned half the hooks and crooks and stamp of political crookedness and ramified disgorgings that Farley taught them; and, at that, Farley is still better than some of the balance of them that they have up there between here and the White House, if we were to take a look at some of them.

Here is what this man says:

I charged to the White House that Mr. Davis, to the best of my belief, is receiving $75,000 for representing these interests, and that he has been serving to the detriment of a respectable and important American industry at the same time he was representing President Roosevelt and the American people abroad.

Mr. Davis and his associates set up the specious theory that the American-robbed investors in Kreuger & Toll can regain some of their losses if the Swedish Match Trust is allowed to sell more of its product in the American market.

You see, we had this Kreuger & Toll business that robbed everybody throughout the world, and particularly the Americans, so, of course, there is one route that Mr. Davis knows to follow; that is, that the man who has been fleeced once can be fleeced twice; so it is only natural that Norman should have gone over there to look up the fellows who were so gullible as to be fleeced in the Kreuger & Toll transaction. So he went out there and held out his lantern in front of them—this man whom we found on the preferred list where they were selling stock to the public at $60 and he was getting it for about $40 and then selling it back to the public at about $60, Mr. Norman Davis.

I will go ahead with this article:

The people who lost in that fiasco should seek relief in the American courts of law against the international bankers who prevailed upon them to risk their money in foreign investment.

There can be no justification for any attempt to promote Swedish, Finnish, and Japanese match manufacture, and slave wages, at the expense of a fine American industry in which $75,000,000 is invested and which employs 25,000 American men and women directly and at least 75,000 more indirectly.

The Japanese wage is one-fourth cent per hour. We pay our women employees 35 cents an hour, our men 50 cents per hour. We are compelled to meet other costs imposed upon us by N. R. A., high taxes, and excise taxes.

Under these conditions it is not to be wondered that foreign competitors can undersell us in the American market by 35 cents per gross. But the fact is that the American consumer gets no benefit from slave-wage matches. He pays a penny a box, just the same.

If Mr. Davis wants to be an American Ambassador, let him be that. If he wants to be a paid fiscal agent for international bankers, let him be that. He should not be both at the same time, at the expense of American industry and American people.

That concludes the statement that this man has made, that Mr. Davis is over there in a double capacity. Of course, it is almost needless to argue here that it is impossible to compete with Japanese labor at a quarter of a cent an hour and pay American labor 50 cents an hour. Those arguments are out of date. We have been condemned to the slums and pitfalls of eternal damnation and the bowwows of hell, if such can be brought on this earth, by some of these pretended policies that have been prescribed. They have not been prescribed as policies for the American people. They have been prescribed according to the statement I read as policies for spoils and rascality carried on by such foreign, roving ambassadors as Norman H. Davis, whose name was found on that preferred list; and no honest government should have ever allowed him to represent them one-half hour after that first exposé was made of him.

What relief do we get from it? Go in the World Court, and let them pass on it, and decide about these things! That is what is to be done whenever it gets so terrible, whenever it is such a bold affront to every reason and right and light of truth that these rascals do not dare come out in the open with it themselves. It has to be terribly rotten, it has to be terribly corrupt when some of the rascals that we have here are not bold enough to champion them; when they have to hide behind the World Court to put things of this kind over, because of the fact that the American Government in 1878 made an award to the contrary.

That is the fix the American people are in today.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. May I take the liberty to suggest to the able Senator from Louisiana that when he makes the observation of these "rascals we have here", he does not really mean physically here in the United States Senate.

Mr. LONG. Oh, the Senator knows that I by all means exclude the Senate, and exclude myself.

Now we have given the American people a baby rattle and another baby rattle. When one baby rattle wears out we give them another. We give them what we call the old "sugar-teat" treatment. My friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] may not know what that is. My friend from Washington [Mr. BONE] displays a knowing look on that matter. So I will tell the Senate what it is.

Back in the country where I come from, Mr. President, which the world has now learned to be about the best part of our country, we have what we call in the country there "camp meetings", revival meetings, where when the spiritual life gets low in the community, we would get some good high-sounding revivalist to come in there and preach hellfire and damnation until he scared the country up again, and then he would move on with the hope that the people would be better. Well, everybody went to these protracted meetings up there around the parish of Jackson. We did not know how to take care of the young ones. Our mothers and all the women folk went to those camp meetings the same as the men folk. They did not have many servants, so they took their babies along in their arms—sometimes two babies—and they spread them out there on the ground among the crowd, listening to the Gospel preached, and now and then having to feed a young one. Well most of these meetings were held in the summertime and one of the young ones would get tired and hot and fretted and would begin to cry and disturb the preacher. We had a little composition that we made up. We took a little biscuit, a little butter, a little sugar, mixed them up together, the crumbs of the biscuit with the butter and the sugar, tied it up in a little rag and tied a string around it. We called that a "sugar-teat."

We put it in the baby's mouth and kept him quiet a while. And after a little while the baby would get contented and pacified and fall off to sleep with the sugar-teat in its mouth. We knew nothing about the germ theory. We never heard that there was such a thing as contagion or contracting these dreaded diseases the one from the other; and so, while one child would lie there asleep pacified by a sugar-teat, another young one would break out, and we would take that sugar-teat out of the mouth of the child that was asleep and put it in the other one's mouth and quiet him with it and then go on with the preaching. And that would happen on and on from child to child until perhaps we would quiet five or six of them with one sugar-teat. And, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] says, "fighting the flies in the meantime."

Yes, Mr. President, that was what we did at the camp meetings. Now, they have seldom changed that system. Right here in this Congress they are still using that old sugar-teat system today. We get up here and we cry that the people of America are starving. We cry that the people of America are naked. We cry that the people of America are homeless. And we get a beautiful message from the President of the United States about like this thing we got in here this morning. And we take that thing and go to sleep. Somebody takes it out of our mouths, and we get up in a week or two and begin to bawl again that nothing has been done, and they bring the same thing back in another form. They bring us the World Court. They bring us the statement that they are going to buy silver. They bring us the securities bill. They bring us the bankers' bill. They bring one thing after another to quiet us day after day and week after week, lulling people into a sense that sooner or later one of these nostrums is going to come containing the promises of the Democratic Party—but they never got by with them yet. We never got one. We have swallowed them; we have accepted them time after time; but the relief is never yet in sight, so far as I can see.

Now, the last thing to come here is this message for the World Court.

I understood when Mr. Hoover had this World Court up here that it was some kind of a gesture; it was not causing any particular row at the time, and none of us said much about it. They slipped it into the Democratic platform with a pending reservation. I understood that that meant all reservations that had been offered; that they had so many offered that they never could take them. So they did not say much about it over at Chicago. No one paid any attention to it. No one ever figured that it counted. It received very little mention there. Men like the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who supported President Roosevelt, and others never thought of anything of the kind—that it meant committing themselves to this World Court in such a form as it may be contended now. But there was one thing in that platform they overlooked. Coupled with the declaration for the World Court with the pending reservations was that these foreign countries were going to pay us the debts they owed us, and anyone who is being told here today that he ought to vote for this World Court should also be told that, coupled with that World Court, was an adherence to the contracts and treaties then existing between America and foreign countries that are parties to this World Court and the payment to us of our debts under those treaties that existed.

Do not come here and say that we are going to slice out of this platform that part which favors England and France, but we are not going to adhere to that part of this platform that favors the United States. They come here to newly elected Senators—I was once newly elected myself, and I know something about the business—and tell them how sacred these platform pledges are, although you vote away American rights—they come here to the new and the old, and they say, "Oh, look what the Democratic platform is." But, if you will put your eyes down and look at the laws that we have been passing here ever since the Democratic Party won, you would not think that the Democratic platform had anything to do with what we are doing here.

Where is that Democratic Party pledge that promised a redistribution of wealth? Where did that go? Will someone please tell me? Where did that go among other things? But if it is insisted that we shall carry out the foreign policies enunciated in the Democratic platform, then let us say, "All right, let us take the whole coat or none." Do not come here and say, "Here are our foreign policies."

Let me see if I have that Democratic platform. Will someone give me the little brown book which contains all the platforms? This is the platform of the two great parties. These are wonderful things, you know—these platforms. The only time we ever see them or hear of them in matters of legislation is just before the election. I have stood here on this floor and read this platform until I have grown hoarse, but I have never been able to get anyone to recognize it to amount to anything since I have been here. Well, here is this platform. I wonder if my friend from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], while I am talking, will locate the foreign policies there about paying the debts, in the Democratic platform?

In this Democratic platform we went on record sounding out to the people something the people would stand for. In other words, we did not give the American people the dose of castor oil just by itself. We said, "If this particular medicine has a little soothing sauce on one side of it and a little sugar on the other that you can swallow it without being hurt particularly at the time." So we put this World Court in with the stipulation that it had to contain all the pending reservations at the time—every reservation that had been set up at the time was to be included in this World Court—and they are not included in this particular thing before us today at all. They have not even come here with the World Court that was supposed to have been considered when that platform was written. That is number one.

But there were with that World Court two other stipulations in the Democratic platform. One was that we should collect from the European countries every dollar, every quarter, every dime, every nickel, every copper cent with interest that they had agreed to pay us.

We advocate a firm foreign policy—

Yes. Very firm, very firm. "How firm a foundation"—

We advocate a firm foreign policy, including peace with all the world—

Yes. Peace between Paraguay and Bolivia because Bolivia wants to claim for the Standard Oil Co. what the United States awarded to Paraguay.

We advocate a firm foreign policy, including peace with all the world and the settlement of international dispute by arbitration; no interference in the internal affairs of other nations; the sanctity of treaties and the maintenance of good faith and of good will in financial obligations; adherence to the World Court—

Now, it is all in the same sentence, gentlemen of the Senate. This thing is not just one little isolated platform. This platform that we advocate is all in the same paragraph, is all in the same sentence, and it is only separated by commas here and there.

We advocate firm foreign policies, that these treaties must be respected, and these debts must be paid—and the World Court after that. And then we come along here with this firm foreign policy. They disregard and throw into the ash can the four-power pact, the Kellogg Pact, the League Pact; they throw into the ash can all the treaties made with South America; they throw into the ash can the Monroe Doctrine; they take the $11,000,000,000 in debt that they owe us and tell us that they will not even pay the interest on it, and then they come and say, "Oh, no; but you still agreed to go into the World Court."

Let them do their part. Let them pay those $11,000,000,000 they owe this country. They say they cannot pay it. I am one of the men who said that as soon as they submit proof to show that they could not pay anything to the United States I would be reasonable about it; but the facts have come to light that a few days before France defaulted on her debt she ordered the construction of a battleship that cost more than the amount due on the debt that France declined to pay at that time to the United States. The amount of the debt upon which France defaulted at the time she did was less than the cost of a battleship that she ordered constructed at the same time.

Then we come along with England. Can England pay her debts? Why, bless your soul, England has balanced her budget! England has reduced her taxes. And here on the front page of the United States newspapers we see blazoned in our faces—

Why does not the United States Congress treat its people good, like the Parliament of Great Britain treats its people?

I read that blazoned headline. Look at the American Congress! It is raising taxes; it is raising costs; it is levying burdens on the people; but the British Parliament is reducing its internal debt and balancing its budget at the same time. Here is the British Parliament taking the burden off the British people, and here is the American Congress putting burdens on the American people. Here is Great Britain balancing its budget; here is America going deeper and deeper into the abyss of financial insolvency.

What was the answer? The United States was paying its debts, but Great Britain was telling us that she did not want to pay us and was not going to pay us, and she did not pay us the debts due us. Oh, no; she wiped them out. She would not recognize the four-power pact, the Kellogg Treaty, and the League Treaty. She threw them out. She entered into a contract under which she got a part of the trade of Manchuria that was taken from China in violation of all treaties. Then we are asked to come here now and take the hind leg—not the quarter, because that belongs to Great Britain and we ought to give her that. In other words, the thief stole into our house in the night and we caught him. There he was with the boodle that he stole from us and from our house, with many other things that he took out of our house. What did we do with the thief? We turned him loose with all that he had. We argued with him for a few minutes and then gave him the boodle that he took to boot. We are giving them an absolute acquittance for the treaties they broke; we are giving them an absolute guaranty against any act of ours to quarrel over the fact that they did not pay their debts; and, after that, here we are voting to submit ourselves to their particular form of rule in the World Court.

Now let me read the whole platform pledge of the Democratic Party. I am going to put in the RECORD at one time the whole thing, including the one little stipulation that people have been led to believe bound us to vote for the pending iniquitous proposal. My friend the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] in a whisper asks me if I was on the platform committee that wrote this document. No; I was not on the platform committee, and I will tell why I was not on that committee. Senators know why, but I will tell them again. I was the leader of the Louisiana delegation there at that time, and they wanted me to go on the rules committee so that we could lead the fight there to break the two-thirds rule, and they would write the platform. We realized that breaking the two-thirds rule would be much more significant in nominating and electing our candidates than the platform was going to be. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said to me one day in reply to a question, he refused even to pay any attention to platforms, because political parties use them to ride in on and pay little attention to them after they have got in. I was not on the platform committee, but I was watching for this thing when the platform came out, and I saw that it was bound up and bogged up deep enough so that it could not amount to anything. That is the only thing I was watching for particularly, besides being interested in keeping the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty from being put in the platform.

I read the platform plank, as follows:

We advocate a firm foreign policy, including peace with all the world and the settlement of international disputes by arbitration; no interference in the internal affairs of other nations; the sanctity of treaties and the maintenance of good faith and of good will in financial obligations; adherence to the World Court with appending reservations; the Pact of Paris, abolishing war as an instrument of national policy, to be made effective by provisions for consultation and conference in case of threatened violations of treaties.

We oppose cancelation of the debts owing to the United States by foreign nations.

That is all in the plank, including the reference to financial obligations, the keeping of treaties—all in one little sentence—and for adherence to the World Court with all the appending reservations to go with it. I have been a Democrat all my life; never anything but a Democrat, representing a real Democratic State [laughter]; one where the Democratic Party has never had any trouble [laughter] in staying Democratic. I represent a State that sends money to other States; I represent a State from which is sent money by the barrels into some of the other States. I mean barrels of silver, not barrels of gold. We sent, I think, seventy or eighty thousand dollars into other States. We do not need any help to stay Democratic in Louisiana, nor generally in the States around our section of the country there. They, too, take care of the Democratic Party pretty well. But I can speak for my own State. We have always been a Democratic State, and I think that is a pretty good guide for Democratic sentiment. The day I, representing that section of Louisiana in which I now live and in which I formerly lived made up of people with whom I have mingled from day to day, would go back to them and say, "Oh, well, we entered the World Court; after letting the four-power treaty be broken, after letting the trade agreements be remade between Manchuria and Great Britain, we entered the World Court, after they threw down the gauntlet and declined to pay their debt", I know that I might as well sign my political death warrant. I might as well do that as to go back to those people and face them after having voted to submit to that Court America and all the principles and all the policies of America, in the face of this kind of a declaration regarding Paraguay's rights which she holds under an American award.

With the intelligence that my constituents have always shown, I am confident that never again would they send me to this body to pass upon their rights; and never again would I ever have the courage to face them under this kind of conditions.

Foreign policy.

We advocate a firm foreign policy.

Why not keep that part of the platform, "a firm foreign policy"? That is what the plank said at the beginning of the sentence, and it includes the adherence to and sanctity of treaties, the payment of debts, and then the World Court with the appending reservations.

Now, we will make you a compromise. If you are going to take us into the World Court, then carry out the whole declaration that is embodied in the one sentence. Go on and get the debts paid; preserve the sanctity of treaties, and then adopt the World Court proposal with all the "appending reservations." It may be that then it might be urged that a Democratic principle was being carried out by Congress, but until that is done there is no such thing.

I say, without the slightest fear of contradiction, without the slightest fear of quibble, that no man is going to stand on this floor and say that he is carrying out the Democratic platform as it is intended and written in by the Democratic convention, who votes to go into this Court, members of which have repudiated their debts to America and the treaties they have signed, the sanctity of which we pledge ourselves to maintain. No man is maintaining either the spirit or the letter or the purpose of the Democratic platform who puts us into the World Court with our rights and our claims to be adjudicated and passed upon by countries that have repudiated the debts which they owe and the treaties which they have heretofore made.

Not only that, but they gave us warning in advance; like the rattlesnake, they gave us a little warning before we got there. They were lulling us into a sense of security; they were rocking us to sleep; they were being as careful and as cautious as the circumstances would permit them to be. They feared that there might be some kind of rustle in the leaves that might wake up the sleeping people who might notice what this thing contained. They did not want to raise a row and point out what they were going to do in South America. They did not want to point out what they intended; but, lo and behold, there is only one field of exploitation left and that is Central America and South America. They have already told Japan, "Go right ahead; take as large a slice off and as big a hunk as you want out of China"; but I prophesy that the day after she takes a notion to annex the Philippines we will not hear any more from England or France about taking them than you heard when Japan took Manchuria away from China, all of which is covered by the same treaties.

All that is left is a great expanse of territory in Central America and South America, rich in oils and mines and fruits and minerals of all kinds and sorts. So the powers comprising at this time the League of Nations start out in advance by flaunting before the eyes of the people of the world, in this year of our Lord 1935, in this present day, a demand, an ultimatum that the American award which now stands, and which has stood for 60 years under the Monroe Doctrine, as between Paraguay, Bolivia, and Argentina, is no longer controlling and respected, and that the countries comprised in the League of Nations representation propose to use force, the power of punitive action of all in order to annul that award and other solemn pacts.

Perhaps Senators do not know there has been an award down there. I am going to read from the book. I will read what Rutherford B. Hayes did in making this award. Here [exhibiting] is the map from which there is not anything left out to be quibbled about in the future and nothing left for the imagination. I now read the award of Rutherford B. Hayes.

NOVEMBER 13, 1878.

Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States of America

To all to whom these presents may come, greeting:

Whereas, pursuant to the fourth article of the treaty of limits between the Argentine Republic and the Republic of Paraguay, of the 3d day of February eighteen hundred and seventy-sixth, it was stipulated that ownership in or right to the territory between the River Verde and the principal arm of the Pilcomayo River, including the city of Villa Occidental, should be submitted to the definite decision of an arbitration; and

Whereas by the fifth article of the same instrument, the two high contracting parties agree to select the President of the United States of America as umpire to decide as to the right to possess the said above-described territory; and

Whereas the high contracting parties have, within the stipulated time, presented their invitation to the proposed umpire which was accepted by him, and have, also duly presented their respective memoirs, and the documents, titles, maps, quotations, references, and all the antecedents which they judge favorable to their rights, as provided in the sixth and eighth articles of said treaty.

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States of America, having duly considered the said statements and the said exhibits, do hereby determine that the said Republic of Paraguay is legally and justly entitled to the said territory between the Pilcomayo and the Verde Rivers, and to the Villa Occidental, situated therein, and I, therefore, do hereby award to the said Republic of Paraguay the territory on the western bank of the river of that name between the Rio Verde and the main branch of the Pilcomayo, including Villa Occidental.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done, in triplicate, in the city of Washington, the twelfth day of November, in the year of our Lord, eighteen hundred and seventy-eight, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third.

R. B. HAYES.

By the President:

[SEAL]

WM. M. EVARTS,
Secretary of State.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in triplicate in the city of Washington—

Right here in the city of Washington! They were not in The Hague. They were not running around in Europe doing this. But it was done and signed—in the city of Washington, the 12th day of November, A. D. 1878, and of the year of independence of the United States the one hundred and third.

R. B. HAYES.

By the President:

WM. M. EVARTS,
Secretary of State.

There is a document signed, sealed, and delivered under the sanctity of the action of the President of the United States in 1878. There that document has stood for a period of 60 years. There is the approval given to it, not only by Rutherford B. Hayes, but by Bolivia 30 years before Hayes made the award. There is the approval to it given the year the award was made. We maintained the Monroe Doctrine in those days. We said to Europe, to Asia, to all the world, "Keep your hands off the soil of the United States and the countries south thereof. Keep your hands off the American continent. We will regard it as an unfriendly act on the part of anyone who undertakes to interfere with the ownership or policies of these countries in North or South America. Stay out of the Western Hemisphere", we said.

Then what? Sixty years passed. The European nations ignored the debt treaty. They ignored the Kellogg Treaty. They ignored the four-power pact. They rode right and left, backward and forward, and now they come along and there is slapped in our face as we stand supinely and accept the decree that notwithstanding the award thus made, that notwithstanding the territory has been awarded to Paraguay, notwithstanding the metes and bounds fixed, the maps and descriptions ordered, notwithstanding everything that has stood here under every recognition of sanctity that could be had, they send word to us from Geneva and we sit here and accept the word from Geneva:

League supports first punitive step to curb Paraguay. Assembly's Chaco group votes unanimously for end of arms embargo on Bolivia. Hints of stronger move. Committee awaits Asuncion's compliance by February 24 with peace proposals.

That is what we get. That is what we are called upon to stand for. That is what we are called upon to sacrifice. That is what we are called upon to put through the United States Senate today. That is what we are called upon to ratify. Senators are going to be sent home, if it is possible that they can be sent home that way, to tell their people that they stood here on the day and date when they were notified by Asiatic and European countries that the European nations are not going to pay another single "dadgummed" cent of money on account of the debt they owe; that they are not going to pay any interest on the money they owe; that they are not going to keep the treaties they have made, but that they propose to enter into trade agreements so they might recover some of the spoils that will occur by reason of the violation of those treaties—Senators will be sent home to tell their people that notwithstanding all that, notwithstanding the plighted word that we would have no foreign violation of those treaties, nothwithstanding the promises made by the Democratic Party that we would do nothing of that kind, none the less Senators are letting the European nations get away with rights and prerogatives that do not belong to them and are letting the Monroe Doctrine be scrapped as a mere piece of paper. We are about to vote to subject the people of America to the World Court which is composed of the kind of representatives who propose to do these things in the teeth of their promises to the American people.

That is what Senators will be sent home to tell their people. I am not going to be sent home to do that. I am not going back with that kind of a message to the people of the sovereign State of Louisana. Somebody else may take that kind of a message home. I may not go home with a sack of pork on my shoulder, but I would rather go home without any extra baggage and be able to face my people and tell them I did not vote for that kind of a proposal here in the United States Senate.

Mr. President, the great power of the Standard Oil Co. is not a mere shadow. I cannot call it a shadow. It pervades each and every endeavor of the American Government in every way. It is more pervading than the sun of noonday. It is more powerful than all the armies of the country. Whenever they come along with their various and sundry sinews, whenever they contribute their might and their moneys, which run into millions of dollars, they do it that they might set up a court on a foreign shore to adjudicate not only our international but even our domestic affairs. When I see them going into a territory prohibited by the award of their own country; when I see the Standard Oil Co. sapping the very life and existence and prosperity under the Stars and Stripes, under whose award and by reason of whose sovereignty there has been given to that little Republic of Paraguay the territory lying between the two rivers I have named; when I see them go down there as citizens of the United States, not supposed to be the supreme master over the United States, but as citizens of the United States, subject to the sovereignty of this country, going to South America for the distinct purpose of flaunting, annulling, and trampling under the soil the very award that has been made by the United States, by the grace of whose existence that company itself gets its right to live; and then when I see them go 3,000 miles away to get an award of interference and intervention by the League of Nations, composed of representatives from countries who have repudiated their debts, who have repudiated the treaties they have made with us, and then have flaunted across the ethereal waves 3,000 miles that they are not only not going to respect those debts and contracts and treaties but they are going to make an award disregarding the Monroe Doctrine, in the face and in contravention of treaties and awards made by the United States, and then when I see prominent Members of the United States Senate stand here and advocate subjecting the United States to the awards of a court composed of that kind of representatives, I fear for the safety and the preservation of the attainments of this great country established so many years ago. They do whatever they please over there. That is the reason why we are being taken into the League.

Go into the World Court? We are going into this Court—why? A short time ago the distinguished leader on this side of the Chamber—I am sorry he is not here now—the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] returned from Europe. I was going over there myself, but I did not have a chance to go. I have been wanting to go to Europe for a long time. Probably I have talked so much about them now that I will not dare to go; but if ever I get money enough to go, I intend to go anyway. I was figuring on going to Europe myself. I did not get to go, but others went. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] took a trip to Europe. Then my friend the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] took a trip to Europe.

When they got back I saw some of their friends and said to them, "Have you heard from my friend the Senator from Arkansas and my friend the junior Senator from Texas as to how they found things over in Europe and how everybody is getting along over there?" One of them said, "Yes; I read in the paper that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Texas gave out a little statement when they got back about how things are in Europe." I said, "I did not see that statement. For some reason or other I overlooked it. I wonder what the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Texas found out over there?"

I was told, "The statements they made were that the war clouds are hovering all over Europe and that bombs are scattered everywhere, and it is a matter, apparently, of a very short time before the war flames will enshroud Europe from one end to another."

I said, "I am glad my friends from Texas and Arkansas took that trip to Europe. They probably know as much about it now as if I would if I had gone over there myself. I am glad they have gone. I am glad they had a chance to see eye to eye and talk lip to lip with the people over there. I knew it without going over there." I said, "Inasmuch as they have really seen what is going on under the League of Nations, inasmuch as they have found out that war is bound to come in Europe, inasmuch as the European nations have not paid to us anything on their debts which they owe to us, inasmuch as they have not kept their treaties, I know these Senators will come back to us and say, 'Stay out of Europe! Stay out of Europe!'"

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. I was much interested a few moments ago when the Senator informed the Senate that our roving Ambassador Davis was employed by the foreign match companies to reduce the tariff on matches. I am deeply interested in that subject, because in my State there is a match concern employing about 800 people. It not only employs that number of people, but it supplies the farmers of the community with the business of furnishing wood for the manufacture of those matches. This industry is located at Cloquet, Minn. The City Council of Cloquet wrote me saying that they understood the duty on matches would be cut in half. If this duty were cut in half, it would put our industry in Minnesota entirely out of business.

I understand that the foreign match companies are now shipping matches into the United States and selling them for 53 cents per gross. Under the N. R. A.—the National Racketeers' Association—I am told that it costs 64 cents to produce a gross of matches in this country.

At that time I wrote a letter to the President, and I wonder if the Senator from Louisiana would do me the courtesy to read the letter in connection with the statement he made in reference to our roving Ambassador Davis.

Mr. LONG. I should be glad to have the letter read. Let the clerk at the desk read it. The Senator might say some things a little bit stronger than I would say, so I ask the Senator to have the clerk read it.

Mr. SCHALL. Very well. I ask that the clerk may read the letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read the letter, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

DECEMBER 18.

The Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The City Council of Cloquet, Minn., by resolution, advises me that arrangements are now being made under your reciprocal tariff powers to reduce the duty on matches 50 percent. The principal industry of Cloquet is match making, and that city will be bankrupted if you carry out this policy.

I am told that your roving ambassador, Mr. Norman Davis, is handling these matters. The concern to be benefited by destroying the town of Cloquet and other match-producing cities of the United States is known as "Kreuger & Toll." This company issued millions of dollars worth of faked bonds before the death of its president. These bonds are held principally by London and Paris international bankers. If the Kreuger & Toll Co. is given the monopoly they desire on the match business of the United States, these faked bonds held by the international bankers can be paid off at their face value. It seems to me that the interests of citizens of the United States should come before the interests of foreign international bankers.

May I also call to your attention that Minnesota and other iron-producing States of the United States are being impoverished by your Tariff Commission permitting the importation of cast iron from India. I am advised that iron miners in India are being paid 10 cents a day in our money and coal miners 8 cents a day. You can very readily see that with the standard of living we are trying to maintain in this country our coal and iron miners cannot compete with this foreign production. Our present tariff on cast iron is about one-sixth of the tariff which England maintains against her own Indian production.

I also again call your attention to the corn-producing States, which are being put out of production by the importation of blackstrap molasses used in the production of commercial alcohol. All of our surplus lands could be planted in sugar beets to furnish all the sugar required in the United States and solve our farm problem. Our farmers should be put in a position to make profits from their labor instead of being chagrined with doles from the United States Treasury.

Cordially yours,

THOS. D. SCHALL.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was just mentioning—and I want Senators who may have lost the connection to recall the fact—what I understood to have been the statements given out by my friends from Arkansas and Texas [Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. CONNALLY] when they returned from Europe that there were war clouds and dangers of imminent war apparent from what they observed in Europe. It might be hardly fair to leave the statements of these two illustrious statesmen without giving them a chance to be here; but the point I was making was that it would seem to me that these statesmen would have returned with this warning, followed up by telling us to stay out of there, instead of going in there any deeper. I cannot get the logic of how it could be that our Democratic leaders came back warning us that the war clouds are about to burst forth in Europe at any hour and, at the same time, telling us to hurry and get in there before the war starts. Just what it is that they have in their minds that is the reason for getting us in there in time for war I never have yet fathomed.

It may be that I have been misled about what these Senators reported. Maybe they found that the situation was peaceful.

Mr. CONNALLY entered the Chamber.

Mr. LONG. Since my friend from Texas has entered the Chamber, Mr. President, I was just quoting what I had understood the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to have said on their return from Europe. I may ask the Senator from Texas if I incorrectly quote him; and if the Senator from Arkansas shall return, I shall make the same request of him.

When I heard of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Texas having taken a trip over to Europe I was anxious to see them on their return; and, not having seen them, I asked some of my colleagues and other acquaintances if they had heard what had been reported by the Senators from Arkansas and Texas on their return to their native land. I was told that both the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Arkansas had said that they found war clouds appearing all over Europe and war bombs scattered everywhere, liable to burst into flames at almost any time. That was what I was told had been reported by the Senator from Texas and by the Senator from Arkansas. So I said to myself, as a result of what I understood had been given out to the country on their return by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Texas, "This is going to solve a very grave problem. It will mean the end of any more agitation to put us over into Europe to meddle with their business, or to have their courts adjudicate our business." I said to myself, and I reasoned in my own mind as I thought of the matter, "These men who have come back and told us that Europe is about to burst into war will not be telling us to get into it before the war starts."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Louisiana undertook to quote the Senator from Texas about third-hand. I do not know the source of his information.

Mr. LONG. May I ask the Senator from Texas if he will tell us directly whether he found in Europe that there was imminent danger of war, or grave danger that Europe might burst into war again?

Mr. CONNALLY. What the Senator from Texas said he said to the press. The Senator from Louisiana did not state that he saw the statement in the press. He said he asked somebody.

Mr. LONG. My recollection is that I asked someone who had read the printed statement. My recollection is that the Senator from Texas was quoted as saying that bombs were scattered everywhere, that war was liable to break out in Europe at any time, and I had understood that the Senator from Arkansas had been quoted to that effect. I wanted to be careful not to misquote either of my colleagues on that matter.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for his meticulous observance of accuracy, and his desire not to misquote anybody.

Mr. LONG. That is always the case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Speaking for myself—and I want to say that my statements appeared as my own and no one else's; I did not seek to speak for anybody else—at the time I returned, conditions in Europe were rather threatening. The King of Yugoslavia had been assassinated over at Marseille. There was a considerable disturbance between Hungary and Yugoslavia and quite a state of tenseness in the international affairs of Europe; and the Senator from Texas did say that conditions in Europe at that time were such that war might be imminent, if that answers the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON entered the Chamber.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, since the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Texas are both here, I had stated that I had understood that upon the return to America of the Senators from Arkansas and Texas, they reached the conclusion that war was imminent in Europe; and, that being the case, I was unable to fathom in my mind how it was that we should be told now that we had better hurry up and get in the Court over there before the war broke out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. No doubt there are many things that the Senator from Louisiana is unable to fathom; but the mere fact that there are sore spots in Europe—which I think must be known to every well-informed Senator, including the Senator from Louisiana—is, in my opinion, no justification for an attitude on the part of the United States, or the citizens of the United States, to refrain from doing what reasonably can be done to encourage the peaceful composition of those disputes which are likely to result in war. I do not concede that the entry of the United States into the World Court would stimulate those controversies, or would involve the United States in those controversies; but, on the contrary, it would be calculated to promote better relations among the nations, better conditions in all countries, and tend to retard those forces that are moving toward violence.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas and I reach a different conclusion.

Mr. ROBINSON. We often do that.

Mr. LONG. I know that we did not get into the European war in 1917 until we got to trying to bring about peace over there.

Mr. ROBINSON. We were not in the World Court then.

Mr. LONG. No; but we were undertaking to settle the war between England and Germany when we got into it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the Senator does not mean to discredit any reasonable effort that any peaceful power might make to promote the composition of differences between other nations.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. Lest some improper inferences might be drawn from what the Senator from Louisiana quoted me as saying, and what I said I had said, I desire to remind him that in 1914 there was a very similar situation, in which a crown prince of Austria was assassinated in the little country of Herzegovina, I believe, and the great European War resulted. Recently, on a similar occasion, when the King of Yugoslavia was assassinated on French soil, because of the instrumentalities which have been set up in Europe for the composition of international differences those matters have been adjusted, and the danger of war has been averted.

Mr. LONG. That is just the point, Mr. President. As the Senator from Texas says, any time one of those monarchs over there gets killed, it is liable to cause war in Europe; and any time we are over there in the World Court, undertaking to be a party to the settlement and adjudication of these difficulties, the more certain it is that we shall be a party to any war that Europe has.

Europe is never going to stay out of flames very long. Not since time began has Europe stayed out of war longer than 20 or 25 years, if that long—I mean, a major war. There was the War of 1870, and they had five or six little wars in between, some of pretty considerable consequence, and war burst out again in 1914; and there is hardly a man in the Senate who thinks there will not be, within less than 5 or 6 years' time, a war that will involve probably both Europe and Asia. We could not possibly, in the League, prevent war between Japan and Russia, or between Japan and China. The only thing we can do is to make ourselves a party to it.

Did the League of Nations, with the United States cooperating, prevent the war between Japan and China? Did not China and Japan both, who had made themselves parties to the League, submit their controversy to the League of Nations, and did not the League of Nations find in favor of China, and did not Japan go in and take Manchuria anyway?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is entirely true that efforts to prevent military conflicts between governments have not always been successful, just as they have not been successful in every instance in preventing clashes between individuals; but, in my judgment, that fact does not constitute any reason why peacefully minded persons or nations should not use their good offices for the prevention of war or for the prevention of fighting.

Mr. LONG. Should the United States go into a situation fraught with war, and sit down now and have its rights adjudicated by a Court composed almost entirely of representatives of nations that are involved in default on debts and obligations to the United States? Is not that in itself almost a complete threat of involving the United States in a war? What is to be our policy?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. We are in the world. The United States is a part of the world, and I trust will continue to be for all time. It is desirable, while it may not always be possible, to compose international difficulties by peaceful methods. The whole tendency of modern civilization is in that direction. Must we, because there is dread or danger of conflict, remain indifferent to conditions that may result in the destruction of millions of lives and the waste of billions of dollars' worth of property? Is there no action that the Senator from Louisiana would recommend save that of remaining completely isolated from all the problems that arise between nations?

As has been pointed out many times during this debate, and no doubt will be mentioned again, there are only two methods by which conflicts or disputes may be determined. One of them is by force. The other is by arbitration or judicial decision. My judgment is that it is both proper and right that we should, in every instance that we can, contribute to the settlement of those disputes by peaceful methods, rather than leave them solely to the arbitrament of war.

I hope I have made my position plain to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator's position is very clear; but, still, of course, to a mind constructed as mine is, it is not understandable.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course I am not responsible for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. No; and I am not going to blame the Senator for that.

Here is the Democratic platform that we are being asked, however, to assail in this ratification. The Democratic platform practically prohibits the ratification of the World Court in this form. Here is the platform:

> We advocate a firm foreign policy, including peace with all the world and the settlement of international disputes by arbitration; no interference in the internal affairs of other nations; the sanctity of treaties and the maintenance of good faith and of good will in financial obligations; adherence to the World Court with appending reservations.

In other words, the same sentence requires, first, the maintenance of peace; second, arbitration of differences; third, noninterference with the internal affairs of other nations; fourth, the keeping of treaties; fifth, payment of the debts that are due us; and then, sixth, the World Court with the pending reservations is a part of that. It is all the same sentence.

Here we are being told to go into court with the war clouds hovering over Europe—they cannot even get along among themselves—to say nothing of the fact that the only way we have kept peace with them is to say nothing when they told us that they would not pay the $11,000,000,000 they owed us. The only way that we kept out of war with Europe was when Europe served notice on America that they would not pay a tinker's cent of the money that they owed us, that we said, "We are sorry; we wish you would; but if you will not, we are not going to do anything about it." We would be in war today if it were not for the fact that when they gave us the ultimatums that they were not going to pay a dime on the French debt or a dime on the English debt that we took it and sat down and did nothing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator imply by that statement that the United States should have gone to war with the debtor nations in an effort to enforce the collection of the debts?

Mr. LONG. I imply by that statement that when the Democratic Party said that we should stick to a firm policy, that treaties should be respected and obligations should be paid; that that should stand before we undertook to go in with those people and put them in as the representatives of a court to decide about our affairs between other countries.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. With all due respect, I do not think the Senator has answered my question. He made a statement a moment ago the plain implication of which was that when the debtor nations refused to meet their obligations to the United States, or failed to do so, we did nothing.

Mr. LONG. That is right.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now I ask the Senator from Louisiana whether he implies by that statement that we should have gone to war with them in order to enforce or attempt to enforce the collection of the debts.

Mr. LONG. No, sir. I will answer the Senator by saying, "No, sir." I would have done just what we did. I would have said, "You promised us you would pay. It is not the first time you have done it." No; I would not have gone to war, but I would have said that. I have learned something again. I would profit from the experience by knowing we made a mistake in getting into Europe's tangle in 1917 and not get into it again. I would not have been like the man who loaned $10 to his friend, who did not pay it back, and whom he threatened to kill, only to have his friend come back the next day and borrow $10 more. I would have said, "Oh, no; you owe us $11,000,000,000. Now you are reducing your taxes, you are balancing your budget, you are being advertised to the world as having a Parliament that loves its people so much that you are reducing the burdens of government off the backs of your people. Now, we are a country; we have not balanced our Budget; day after day we go farther into the pit of financial insolvency; day after day our people are worse off. You owe us more. Now we say to you, 'You stop over there balancing your budget, reducing your debt and putting yourselves in this pink of full bloom until you pay us these debts that we said you have to pay; otherwise we will never think of going into a court here to have you take away more rights of the American people as you did this last time.'"

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I was just about to ask the Senator, if he had made that statement, which is substantially what we did say to them, that we desired them to pay the debt, and insisted on their payment of the debt, but if they had refused, then what would have been his action?

Mr. LONG. Stay out of the World Court. Stay out of the World Court.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why? The World Court has no jurisdiction of any question of that nature.

Mr. LONG. What is the purpose of the World Court, then?

Mr. ROBINSON. The World Court is to decide such disputes as are referred to it by the parties to controversies.

Mr. LONG. Yes. In other words, the World Court is composed of A, B, C, and D, who owe us $11,000,000,000. Now we have a row with C, and we let A, B, and D settle that row. Then we have a row with B, and we let A, C, and D settle that row. In other words, we have a Court here composed of 10 nations, all 10 of whom owe us money, and we let 9 of them decide any row we get into with the tenth.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there may be many disputes or controversies to which the United States may become a party which it would desire to refer to the Court. There would be others which it would not refer to the Court. The Senator will pardon me, but I do not see the force of his contention in that particular.

Mr. LONG. In this connection is another thing that might be considered. Today the League of Nations tells us that the Monroe Doctrine does not amount to anything. The Senator from Arkansas does not know they have done that, but they have. I will show the Senator that they did. Here is an award that we made. In 1878 the United States made an award to Paraguay of the territory lying between the Pilcomayo and the Verde Rivers, and that was accepted by all countries under the Monroe Doctrine, concerning which we did not allow them to interfere.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand. I heard the Senator's very forceful statement on that subject this morning; but what I cannot understand is what the World Court has to do with the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. LONG. They are going to have plenty to do with it. The League of Nations has already taken control of it, and the World Court is a branch office of the League of Nations.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that statement is correct.

Mr. LONG. I do not see why the Senator does not. Who is it under whom this World Court is maintained? Was it not created by the League of Nations?

Mr. ROBINSON. It was certainly suggested by the League of Nations, and I think in doing it the League of Nations performed a service of great importance and value to the entire world.

Mr. LONG. All right. Now, here is what the grandpa of the World Court stated:

League supports first step to curb Paraguay. Assembly's group votes unanimously for end of arms embargo on Bolivia.

And this article goes on to state that they have told the Paraguayan people, who are nothing but proprietors of an American award, that they must surrender to them the arbitration of a territory awarded to them by America 60 years ago. Under the Monroe Doctrine they would no more have dared to have done a thing like that than they would have attempted to communicate with Mars.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think that is a correct statement. I perhaps should not interrupt the Senator. It is my understanding, however, that the efforts and purposes of the League of Nations in that connection are to secure a peaceful composition of the dispute between Bolivia and Paraguay; because under the Kellogg-Briand Pact most of the nations of the world have obligated themselves not to resort to force but to resort to peaceful or pacific means for the settlement of their disputes, and the action of the League of Nations, as I understand, is taken not to determine the controversy but to induce its settlement by peaceful methods.

Mr. LONG. No; that is not the purpose. The League of Nations did not open its mouth for 2 years while this struggle was going on.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I should like to know is just exactly what it is that the League of Nations has decreed in this regard. I was just asked by one of the newspapermen concerning the League of Nations' action. I know nothing about it, and I am curious to know whether the League of Nations has applied sanctions to one of the antagonists in the Chaco War.

Mr. LONG. Yes, sir. They have done more than that.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana; but the purpose of the sanctions is to secure a peaceful method of settling the dispute and to end the war.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may be one interpretation, and it may be the interpretation of the Senator from Arkansas; but the application of sanctions means the starving of women and children and noncombatants and the weak and the sick and the infirm and the aged. That is the peaceful means that sanctions accomplish—that and that alone! If that is not worse than warfare, I do not know what is worse than warfare.

Mr. ROBINSON. In this case, taking the press report read by the Senator from Louisiana, the purpose of the sanctions is to prevent the shipment of munitions to the party to the controversy which refused to enter into any arrangement for peaceful settlement.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is why I asked the questions: What are the sanctions? If they are sanctions that are provided by the League of Nations, they are the sort that I have indicated. It may be some other kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Louisiana has indicated clearly, I think, that the arrangement which the League is proposing is to place an embargo on the exports of munitions to Paraguay from the respective countries in the League.

Mr. LONG. No; that is not it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting, and defer any argument of mine upon this subject until I know definitely just what the sanctions are.

Mr. LONG. In order that the Senators from Arkansas and California may understand what I understand to be the fact, I will state that what happened was this: America awarded this territory through an award in 1878 to Paraguay. It is an American award. You have the stamp of the United States on this territory today that it belongs to Paraguay.

Here is the map printed by Bolivia, and here is the award of the President of the United States, describing this land between the Pilcomayo River and the Verde River, including the Villa Occidental, as being the property of Paraguay. Now you have the stamp of the United States on that territory lying between those black lines here. After purchasing from the Vickers Co. in London certain munitions Bolivia started a war. How? Here is what Bolivia did. After that territory had been awarded by the United States to Paraguay, Bolivia said this in 1932. This is the President's message to the Bolivian Congress:

> It is only sufficient to maintain one case at the moment. Bolivia has on the eastern side of her mountains great petroliferous riches, with various wells already drilled, and exploitations may be entered into immediately. There is urgent need of these resources, and we are now obliged to look upon them as valueless. Bolivia cannot move this petroleum to the Argentine because that country, in view of its interests, has closed the outlet with high protective tariffs. The natural and logical remedy would be to construct a pipe line to the Paraguay River.

That meant going right through the territory awarded by the United States to Paraguay.

But there lies the Republic of Paraguay disputing the territory. And what did they do? They entered into a contract with the Standard Oil Co. for the furnishing of supplies in order that they could take a pipe line to go through the territory between the Verde and the Pilcomayo Rivers that had been awarded by the United States to Paraguay in 1878 and held peacefully ever since with the recognition of all contiguous countries.

Now they could not come to the United States with this case, because the United States had made its award. But the Standard Oil Co. took it to Geneva, or The Hague—wherever the League sits—they took this case over to the League of Nations.

The Standard Oil Co. filed its own brief with the League of Nations. Bolivia filed its brief with the League of Nations. And what happened? Why, Paraguay said to them, "You do not mean to say that you are going to try to bother us in this territory that has been awarded to us by the United States?" And what was said in reply? Bolivia said, "We decline to recognize the award made by the United States in 1878; we decline to recognize what was done by the United States, and we demand the League of Nations to pass upon what ought to be done with this territory awarded by the United States to Paraguay"; and, by golly, they have undertaken to do it. They have undertaken to set it aside. The League has said, "Stop this war, and we are going to negotiate." For the 2 years they did not say a word because it looked like Bolivia would win the war, but lo and behold, Paraguay has been getting the better of the war. At the end of 2 years Paraguay has whipped Bolivia, and then the League of Nations comes out and says what? "We demand that you stop; we will have a meeting in Buenos Aires for a period of 60 days to settle this thing, and if we are unable to bring a mutual peace between the parties within 60 days, then the matter shall be taken to The Hague for a decision." In other words, they know they cannot settle it in 60 days; they know that all Bolivia has got to do is to hold out and refuse to accept the award made by the United States in 1878. So they say, "All right; then we are going to transfer this controversy; not only the Hayes award but everything else, to The Hague, there to be decided when time runs out, and we are ready to render a decision."

In other words, they are a supreme court that has set itself up to annul, modify, affirm, or reverse awards made under the Monroe Doctrine by the United States of America; they are going down there to do it; and they have said, "Oh, no, Paraguay; we are not going to recognize your right to retain this territory that has been given to you by the United States; you have got to stop firing a gun on the soil where you are now placing your batteries, soil that was given to you by the United States; you cannot stand there and fire another gun because the Standard Oil Co. has got oil wells there and you are about to get right up to where the Standard Oil Co. is going to drill oil wells under a lease given to them by Bolivia in the teeth of an award to the contrary made by the United States." And now they say, "We are going to take punitive measures against you; we are not only going to cut off the arms you shall get but we are going to give arms in abundance to Bolivia, and we are going further than that, we are going to use all further punitive means that may be necessary to give to the League of Nations the right to decide this matter in another way than it was decided by the United States 60 years ago." That is what they have done. Talk about the Monroe Doctrine, talk about human rights, talk about American sovereignty; there never has been a case in the public records to compare with this since the Stars and Stripes hung over the United States Senate, and there has never been a more open flaunting of everything that is supposed to be sacred to American institutions, the Monroe Doctrine, the sanctity of an award, than that which has been agreed on by countries that are members of the World Court.

Now they say, "Oh, no. Bolivia has decided that it will not recognize the award made by the United States." Will they submit this controversy for another decision by the United States? Oh, no; here is Bolivia's own map. When the United States made that award Bolivia recognized it and promulgated a map which she had drawn 30 years before the United States made the award, giving all this territory to Paraguay; and when the United States made the award Bolivia sent a delegation to Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, to congratulate the Paraguayans on the justice of that award made by the President of the United States, and to assure the Paraguayan Government that she would stand back of it to the limit of her ability in maintaining possession of that territory. And yet, despite the action of the United States under its own seal and despite the Monroe Doctrine that prevailed, today they say, "Paraguay, stop fighting, or we will help fight against you." Stop fighting—for what? Stop fighting because we demand the right of the League of Nations to overrule, reverse, or to modify what the United States has settled and what has been settled for 60 years. Why? Because all this publicity which we have seen in the United States in regard to the League of Nations has largely been supported by the same fortunes that support this aggression, the taking away of this territory that was given by the United States to Paraguay. That is the story; that is what we are being told to get into; that is why we are being asked to sit silently by and to agree that a set of countries that are indebted to this country, Great Britain, France, Russia, and others, that, put together, owe the United States $11,000,000,000, shall sit as a supreme court to pass upon whether or not they will not take away territory that has already been awarded in South America, which award has been agreed to by the parties for a period of 60 years.

Are we getting into war? What would you do if you were in the League of Nations or the World Court and they took that land that the United States awarded to Paraguay and gave it to Bolivia? Would the United States stand for a situation of that kind, or what would the United States do? Talk about a war! How does the United States today maintain its national respect when a country to which it has awarded land has been ordered to suspend fighting for it and give up its occupation of that land until the question can be taken over to The Hague and it can be decided whether or not the American award will be recognized? Are we going to transfer all these kinds of settlements that have been made under the Monroe Doctrine for a period of nearly a hundred years over to The Hague? Apparently that is the only thing to be done under this procedure.

I say, Mr. President, the whole thing is just as unconstitutional, it is just as contrary to American traditions and policies, and just as contrary to the Democratic platform as it is possible to be. The Democratic platform would compel the repudiation of the World Court proposal now before the Senate.

We do not read a contract under which it is provided that I agree to deliver 1,000 bushels of corn in consideration of a thousand dollars in cash, in a light by which I pay my money but do not get the corn. We do not read an established agreement between nations providing "if you pay me my debts and keep your agreements, then I am willing to sit around the table and arbitrate other disputes with you", in a light by which it may be construed to say, "Oh, yes; do not pay me my debt; do not keep your agreements, and still I will let you pass on my rights." That is not done among men; that is not done among States; that is not done among nations that have the sense of men.

Would we, as a nation, sit with 10 other nations that, altogether, owed us $11,000,000,000, and allow the other 9 to adjudicate a particular controversy that we have with a debtor? How would it be if we had an argument with France, and England and Russia and Spain should settle that; and if we had an argument with Spain, that England and Russia should settle that; and so forth, until whatever rights and claims we might have were settled by those who today are partners in mulcting the American people? I use that term charitably; but I tell you that today they are partners in mulcting the American people on the basis of debts that the Democratic Party has said they have got to pay.

Further than that, they have gone beyond even mulcting the American people of the debts, as evidenced by their action when the American Nation, through the then Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, protested certain acts, Mr. Stimson was supported, as my recollection goes, by every member of the Foreign Relations Committee in the United States Senate at the time. I may be in error about that, but my understanding is that when Mr. Stimson, in the case of the Manchurian dispute, called upon England and France and Japan to respect the pact prevailing at that time regarding the territorial integrity of China and the right of China to possess Manchuria—when Mr. Stimson called upon them to maintain and hold inviolate the covenants and provisions of that treaty, there was not one Member of the Senate vested with jurisdiction over foreign affairs who did not in some manner support the position and hold up the hands of Mr. Stimson, the Secretary of State, in that controversy.

What did Mr. Stimson do? He acted along the lines of the Democratic platform even before we wrote it. Mr. Stimson said, "We demand that Japan immediately cease its warfare in the Manchurian area; that she retire from that territory; and that no country recognize Japan as lawfully or legally entitled to the possession of one foot of Manchurian territory, or to establish any republic or any other form of government over territory heretofore belonging to China." What did other nations do? England declined to back up Stimson and the United States; France declined to back up Stimson and the United States; all of them refused to back up China and the United States, including, I suppose, Germany and the others of them.

What happened? We let Japan go right into China, take the Manchurian territory, and set up whatever kind of rule she wanted to set up over it. That, however, was not all. There were fruits of that aggression; there were spoils to be had; there were spoils to be had by reason of those treaties having been broken. What were those spoils? England came up with one of them; a contract for a certain part of the barter and trade to be gotten in Manchuria went to England. At the very time that she owed us our money and would not pay us our money, at the very time that she was signed up to keep China from being attacked by Japan, at the very time, Mr. President, that she was a debtor of ours and beholding to us, she declined to maintain those sacred covenants, and the next thing we know she came out with a part of the spoils derivable from that territory illegally taken from China. Then we are asked to put the United States into a World Court and let that kind of outfit pass upon our international rights in the future, if not our domestic rights.

That is the kind of outfit that you are picking out to pass on the Monroe Doctrine; that is the kind of a supreme court which has established itself to rule over these matters and which you are picking out for the United States to adhere to; that is the kind of a market where you are driving your geese to today.

Respect a contract! What is to become of the Democratic platform if we are to say, "Well, you have refused to pay attention to anything we have deemed sacred; whatever accretion there is that inures to you, whatever there is that is burdensome or which may be burdensome on you to perform, you will forget." That is the status of things.

Why, Mr. President, it has been the policy of rulers of all countries even before, I presume, we got in the class of being a man under the Darwinian theory—and, by the way, I can almost explain that Darwinian theory [laughter] when I see some of the treaties that go through.

We have been trying to find the missing link so as to connect the animal to mankind and prove that man sprang from animals; we have been picking the lowest kind of man to compare with the highest kind of animal in intellect, thinking that when we reach the most intellectual animal it will be somewhere close to the lowest in intellect of man. We have never been yet able to find that missing link which connects the low order of man with the high order of animal life, and we never will. But the day that we pick out the higher order of man and compare him with the lower order of animals we are likely to find the missing link. [Laughter.]

This is one of the things to prove it: What form of animal life was ever heard to set itself up to be ravished by an element that had practically destroyed it in the past; what kind of a hyena that has found another animal its intellectual and physical master, bent upon despoiling it, would ever walk into the den of that kind of an animal and submit itself to the jurisdiction of other forces to come thereafter. We are being called upon to circumscribe the conduct of the American people in their international relations, and when we circumscribe our conduct in our international relations we circumscribe our conduct in our domestic relations. There never was an interstate contract or law that did not affect intrastate business. There never was a State law that did not affect municipalities. Just so surely as we circumscribe the international activities and conduct of the American people and make them subject to the pronouncements of the World Court, just so surely will we, from day to day and from year to year, find a court that is always reaching out for jurisdiction.

The United States Supreme Court has been reaching out for jurisdiction ever since it was created. There is not a State court ever known that has not been reaching out for more jurisdiction. No one ever thought the United States Supreme Court had the jurisdiction it has taken unto itself, but day after day and year after year the only thing the United States Supreme Court has to limit it in its jurisdiction is what the Supreme Court itself declines to say it has jurisdiction over.

When we created the United States Supreme Court no one thought it had any such jurisdiction over the States as it later undertook to assert and did assert. There was a time after the United States Supreme Court was created that, if it had rendered a decree directed to a State court ordering it not to hang somebody it had found guilty of murder, but to send the case to the Supreme Court and let it pass on the proceedings, the State would have refused to pursue that course. In several such cases the States refused to respect the decision of the United States Supreme Court and went ahead and hung the man nevertheless. If I am not mistaken one of those cases arose in Florida where there was a decision actually rendered by the United States Supreme Court directing the State court to submit the case to it, but nevertheless the State went ahead and hung the man who had been convicted of murder.

Today the World Court is being established just like we established the United States Supreme Court. What is the jurisdiction of the World Court? The only body that will be left to say what are the limits of the jurisdiction of the World Court will be the World Court itself. That will be the only Court before whom we will ever be permitted to go to file an exception to the jurisdiction of the Court. That will be the only Court before whom we will have to make the argument, day after day and year after year, as to whether the Court has jurisdiction over a particular controversy or not. Just so sure as the sun rises in the morning, in every case that goes up to that Court, it will go on increasing its jurisdiction, and the Court will go further and further and further into the deciding of particulars and matters involving the various countries of the world.

Of course, it is said we can withdraw. We thought the States could withdraw when we started the American Union. Massachusetts thought it had the right to withdraw from the United States. They held the Hartford Convention and said they could. Time after time there were other States which held meetings and there never was a question about the fact that they were supposed to have the right to withdraw from the United States. What was it that kept them in the United States? It was the fact that the United States had a bigger army than the State or States which wanted to withdraw.

The time finally came when the Southern States claimed their sovereign authority to withdraw from the United States of America. What did the United States of America say? They said, "Oh, no; you have gone too far with this thing. You are involved in too many of our matters. A house divided against itself cannot stand, and therefore you cannot withdraw from the Union."

So it will be with the World Court if we go into it. If we go into the World Court and try to withdraw, there will be only one way we can withdraw and not respect the findings of that Court, and that will be by having a bigger army than the combined powers the Court can put against us. The only way we will ever be able to defy whatsoever the Court may adjudicate or decree will be by having an army big enough to defy the Court and all its members. If we have a less army then we will no more be able to defy their aggression than we of the South were able to defy the aggression of the United States of America in 1861, glad though we are today that we were not.

Do not fool yourselves and do not be fooled about the thing. Today you are going to adopt the World Court and authorize it to sit over the destinies of all the nations of the world. You are doing a good thing, you say. You say they are going to be friendly; that we are all going to be friendly. Yes; we are going to be friends just as long as we will not undertake to compel them to do anything they promise to do that is in our favor. Just so long will we be friendly. Just so long as we do not object to doing anything that is in their favor we will be friendly.

Are there any such things as lights before our feet to guide us by reason of what has been done in the past? I have nothing upon which to base my opinion as to what is going to happen in the future other than what has happened in the past. What has happened in the past?

We traveled 3,000 miles away in order that we might make Europe safe for democracy. We went 3,000 miles across the sea and blew our bugles over there. We went 3,000 miles to make Europe safe for democracy, and how did we wind up? We wound up with all Europe under dictatorship, and we are trying to set up one in the United States at the same time. The only thing we need in America to be completely Europeanized is to set up a dictatorship in this country. We have placed in the boards and bureaucracies of this Government today dictatorial powers to do really more than the Hitlers and the Mussolinis of Europe are doing.

America has to decide now, or within a few days, how it will regard its rights. Will we say: "We remain here willing to be friendly, but without you to pass upon the question of whether or not we are maintaining the proper friendly attitude"?

How did we come out of the last war? After giving them all our money, billions of dollars of it, after burying our men in unmarked graves, how did we come out? We came out with our soldiers buried, our money spent, our country bankrupt, labeled by Europe as "Uncle Shylock." We went over to England and spilled our blood, we buried our soldiers, we brought our wounded home for treatment, and how did England regard us? "Uncle Shylock!" We went to France to pay a debt. We went over there, gave our money, and loaned them more money. How did France regard us? "Uncle Shylock!" After giving them billions of dollars and then lending them $11,000,000 more we wound up without one single friend in the entire European Continent. Not one in Asia or Europe could be found friendly to the United States, so I have been informed. And yet today, with their repudiating their debts to us, with their repudiating our sacred treaties and pacts, with their defying the award by the United States even in a country on the American Continent, we call upon ourselves to say whether or not we are going to submit 125,000,000 men, women, and childen, to say nothing about unborn generations to come, to the mercies of the representatives of those countries who have heretofore regarded us, and apparently still regard us, in that light.

LEAGUE SUPPORTS FIRST PUNITIVE STEP TO CURB PARAGUAY—ASSEMBLY'S CHACO GROUP VOTES UNANIMOUSLY FOR END OF ARMS EMBARGO ON BOLIVIA—HINTS OF STRONGER MOVE—COMMITTEE AWAITS ASUNCION'S COMPLIANCE BY FEBRUARY 24 WITH PEACE PROPOSALS

By Clarence K. Streit

GENEVA, January 16.—Creating a major precedent, the League of Nations Assembly's Chaco committee unanimously recommended tonight that all League members end their arms embargo insofar as it applies to Bolivia and strengthen it insofar as it applies to Paraguay.

This is the first time the League of Nations has ever resorted to force to bring around a recalcitrant member. The resolution adopted does not mention sanctions or article XVI, but the action taken, all admit, amounts to the first application of sanctions and to condemning Paraguay henceforth as the aggressor in the Chaco War.

Stronger punitive measures were threatened if Paraguay fails to change her attitude by February 24, when will expire the time limit in article XII, which obligates all League members "in no case to resort to war until 3 months after * * * the report by the council."

NEW INTERPRETATION GIVEN

Today's resolution adopts a far-reaching new interpretation of this obligation in connection with the undertaking of all League members in article XV, paragraph 6, not to "go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report." This interpretation, as reported recently, is that since Bolivia has complied with the report Paraguay as a League member "must" not resort against her after February 24 despite an apparent loophole in article XII.

The implication seems to be that Bolivia, which by today's embargo action is practically authorized to make war against Paraguay, becomes legally free through article XII on February 24 to declare war and enjoy all the belligerent rights denied to Paraguay.

Soviet Russia and Sweden both asked at today's meeting why the Covenant was not applied still more strongly. They were told the situation would be ripe for further action on February 24, if Paraguay did not give in.

None of the 23 delegates objected to today's action. The fact that Capt. Anthony Eden, British Lord Privy Seal, explicitly supported it caused a deep impression, for Great Britain, even after agreeing to send troops to the Saar Basin territory for police duty, was reluctant to establish any sanctions precedent. It is understood the British are now ready to break diplomatic relations with Paraguay as an added sanction, but this did not come up today.

Many European diplomats feared that Britain, in view of the diplomatic conversations now going on about armaments, security, and Germany's return to the League, would seek to stave off sanctions as especially embarrassing to her at this particular moment. These diplomats, therefore, deem today's precedent as "very important" and feel it is promoting peace in Europe if not in South America.

OUR COOPERATION SOUGHT

Captain Eden added his support to a request that the committee's cooperation with nonmembers of the League, meaning especially the United States, be improved now; but Francisco Castillo Najera, of Mexico, president of the committee, told them that because of the special relations with those states, he thought it would be sufficient merely to transmit today's report to the United States and Brazil.

This was done, as it was considered to amount to a tactful recommendation that nonmembers of the League take the same action as members. Washington's reply is awaited with great interest, as the United States hitherto has stood even more strongly than Britain for an embargo against both parties.

The meeting was private, and text of the report and the resolutions were withheld until tomorrow. The committee declares Bolivia accepted the Assembly's report and Paraguay rejected it, and then makes the interpretation of article XII, as mentioned.

It concludes by recommending definitely, although not in these words, that League members now permit their armament companies to sell freely to Bolivia while taking all possible measures to render the embargo more efficacious "insofar as they intend to maintain it"—which is to say, against Paraguay. It specifies that the Paraguayan embargo should be strengthened notably, first, as regards transit, export, and reexport; and, second, that League members should grant licenses to ship arms only to governments and governmental agents.

URGE STRONGER EMBARGO

Except for this last recommendation, the action taken was that recommended to the committee by its subcommittee of six. One member found the recommendation "a great step in advance" but still too loose, and he proposed stiffening the embargo against Paraguay in the ways mentioned. Captain Eden agreed the embargo was not effective and needed strengthening, as did René Massigli, of France.

Señor Najera then asked what they meant by strengthening, and Captain Eden immediately replied that he meant tightening export and reexport regulations, while M. Massigli stressed the reexport side. This demonstration was meant mainly as pressure on Argentina and Uruguay.

Argentina explained that her neutrality proclamation forbade export and reexport but that she could do nothing to prevent arms transit by water as the rivers leading to Paraguay are international. The Uruguayan delegate said he would inform his Government, which, he assumed, would get in touch with its neighbors.

It remains to be seen whether the embargo will be really tightened. Some fear the move comes too late and that by February 24 Paraguay will already have the oil fields.

The League's Leticia advisory committee contented itself with bringing mild moral pressure on the Colombian Congress to ratify that accord. Ferdinand Mayer, councilor of the Berne Legation, represented the United States on that committee. Prentiss Gilbert, United States consul, followed the Chaco meeting from the corridor.

MAY REQUIRE ACT OF CONGRESS

WASHINGTON, January 16.—Any United States sanction toward cooperating in lifting the ban on munitions shipments to Bolivia while maintaining it on Paraguay, because of the latter's rejection of the League of Nations' peace overtures, would apparently require authorizing legislation by Congress.

President Roosevelt proclaimed on May 28, 1934, a ban on munitions sales in this country to Bolivia and Paraguay, under authority of a resolution by Congress. Previously the Senate Foreign Relations Committee had refused to permit such action against one country and not the other.

The State Department had not received today the official notice from the League of Nations of its recommendations, but when it does Secretary Hull is expected to take up the question with President Roosevelt.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I prefer to proceed tomorrow, and I understand the majority leader is willing to have me retain the floor at that time.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. VANDENBERG. With that understanding, I yield the floor for the day.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Senate resume legislative session.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

ADMINISTRATIVE AGENCIES IN GOVERNMENT (S. DOC. NO. 12)

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there has come to my attention a very instructive discussion on administrative agencies in government, written by Nathan Boone Williams, a well-known lawyer of this city, whom I have known for many years. I am of the opinion that this document will be very helpful and informative in our consideration of numerous legislative matters coming before us. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Mr. BACHMAN. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably certain resolutions, without amendment, and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

There being no objection, the following resolutions, reported this day by Mr. BACHMAN from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, without amendment, were severally considered and agreed to:

Senate Resolution 53, submitted by Mr. BAILEY on the 15th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during sessions or recesses of the Senate.

Senate Resolution 52, submitted by Mr. SHEPPARD on the 15th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized, during the Seventy-fourth Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

Senate Resolution 48, submitted by Mr. COOLIDGE on the 15th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

Senate Resolution 51, submitted by Mr. SMITH on the 15th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any sessions or recesses of the Senate.

Senate Rosolution 47, submitted by Mr. ROBINSON (for Mr. TYDINGS) on the 15th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

Senate Resolution 45, submitted by Mr. WALSH on the 14th instant:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized during the Seventy-fourth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during any session or recess of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of nominations on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the first order of business under the head of nominations on the Executive Calendar.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James A. Moffett, of New York, to be Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask that the nomination go over for 1 day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

ENVOYS EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTERS PLENIPOTENTIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William H. Hornibrook, of Utah, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Afghanistan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William Dawson, of Minnesota, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Colombia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Antonio C. Gonzalez, of New York, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Ecuador.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George T. Summerlin, of Louisiana, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Panama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Julius G. Lay, of the District of Columbia, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Uruguay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Meredith Nicholson, of Indiana, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Venezuela.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Williamson S. Howell, Jr., of Texas, to be consul general of the United States of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining nominations on the calendar in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations on the calendar in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service will be confirmed en bloc.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the same request with respect to the nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar will be confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, January 18, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessing and honor, glory and power be unto Him who sitteth upon the throne forever and ever. Before Him we would bow down and bare our souls that we might receive the gifts of mercy and comfort. Almighty God, rouse us to the contemplation of things eternal and let their currents keep our souls in motion. To every fear Thou dost give a promise, and to every prodigal doubt Thou dost offer assurance. To any who may be in the gloom, with fitful and uncertain glimpses through the clouds and without a smiling future, do Thou steady and stay their faith in divine sovereignty which will never terminate until the throne of God itself crumbles. Bless our homes, merciful Father, and may they ever be the very gates to Heaven. In the name of our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CENTRAL VALLEY PROJECT, CALIFORNIA

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a copy of a bill I have introduced for the construction of the Central Valley project in California.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, late in the last Congress I appeared before the House and served notice that, at the opening of the current session, I would bring to the attention of the Congress the great need for early construction activities on the Central Valley project in California, a project designed to protect and preserve the social and economic status of a great inland nation. Today, in keeping with that earlier statement and a later promise to my people, I am introducing a bill which calls for a congressional appropriation of $170,000,000 for construction of the Central Valley project. The bill is designed to provide Federal financial assistance for the project with supervision under a water project authority created by the California State Legislature and later approved by the people of California in a special election.

As a matter of record, I desire herewith to present the bill which I have introduced, and to offer you a preliminary statement showing the practicability of the project, its need as a social agency, and its feasibility from an engineering standpoint. Before going further, let me add that the project is a self-liquidating one, and the cost will be borne by those who benefit from it.

A BILL

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of improvement of navigation on the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers in the State of California; to control destructive flood waters in said Sacramento and San Joaquin River Basins; to aid and improve agriculture and industry within said basins; to provide for the generation of electrical energy as a means of making the project hereinafter referred to a self-supporting and financially solvent undertaking; to provide for the economic and social well-being of the people of the State of California, and for other beneficial purposes, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $170,000,000.

SEC. 2. All moneys authorized to be appropriated by this act shall be made available as herein provided for expenditure by the Water Project Authority, a body politic and corporate, created in and by an act of the Legislature of the State of California passed and adopted at the legislative session of 1933, and designated the Central Valley project act of 1933 (ch. 1042, Stat. of 1933), and thereafter approved by the people of the State of California at a special election held in said State on December 19, 1933; said moneys to be expended, subject to the provisions of this act, for the purpose of the acquisition of the necessary rights and properties and the construction by said Water Project Authority of the Central Valley project, as said project and the construction thereof is authorized, set forth, and provided for in said Central Valley project act of 1933, and hereinafter referred to as "project."

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War shall have and exercise joint power and authority in administering this act.

SEC. 4. The said Secretary of the Interior and the said Secretary of War shall authorize and approve all expenditures to be made under this act; shall approve any and all plans and specifications for the construction of said Central Valley project; shall exercise general supervision and control over the construction of said project to the extent necessary to insure substantial compliance with the approved plans and specifications; shall approve all contracts entered into by said water project authority for the sale, use, or disposal of water and electric energy or other facilities to be made available by the operation of said project as to their sufficiency in matters of both form and substance, and shall have and exercise such incidental powers as may be necessary or appropriate to insure the proper application of the funds made available hereunder and to protect properly the interests of the United States in the premises. Upon the completion of construction of said project and the repayment to the fund hereinafter created of all moneys loaned to said water project authority, for the repayment of which provision is made in this act, together with interest thereon as herein provided, and the transfer of said moneys so loaned, together with interest, into the United States Treasury, all powers, duties, and functions created and established by this act shall cease and terminate.

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby established a special fund, to be known as "Central Valley project fund" (hereinafter referred to as the "fund"), and to be available, as hereinafter provided only for carrying out the provisions of this act. All payments or advances to said water project authority, and all moneys received therefrom, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be made from, or received into said fund, under the direction of the Secretary of Interior and the Secretary of War.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to advance to the fund for the use of and expenditure of said water project authority, from time to time and within the appropriations therefor, such amounts as the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War shall certify to be necessary to meet the requirements for funds of the construction program of the said water project authority, except that the aggregate amount of such advances shall not exceed the said sum of $170,000,000, the appropriation whereof is herein authorized.

Of the total amount herein authorized to be appropriated, $38,000,000 thereof is hereby allocated as a direct grant to said water project authority and shall be used and applied toward defraying the cost of the necessary labor and materials entering into the cost of the construction of said projects; $12,000,000 thereof is hereby allocated as a special and direct contribution to and participation in the cost of construction of the Kennett Dam of said project on account of the general and Federal benefits from the construction of said dam to navigation, flood control, and salinity control, in accordance with the report of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department dated April 6, 1934, and contained in House of Representatives Document No. 35, Seventy-third Congress, second session, and shall be used and applied toward defraying the cost of construction of said Kennett Dam; both of which sums, constituting in the aggregate $50,000,000, shall be made available to said water project authority for the uses and purposes of this act, and in the manner herein provided and subject to the provisions of this act, without necessity of or provision for repayment or reimbursement to said fund or to the Treasury of the United States; the remaining sum of not to exceed $120,000,000 shall be allocated and made available to said water project authority as a loan, to be repaid to said fund over a period of 40 years commencing with the tenth year after beginning of construction of said project, and to bear interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum. As security for such repayment, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War are authorized and empowered to accept and receive the revenue bonds of said water project authority, or may purchase such revenue bonds, and may execute such contract or contracts with said water project authority as may be necessary, expedient, or advisable in order to protect the interests of the United States, and may supervise and approve the operation and maintenance of said Central Valley project so long as said loan or any part thereof shall remain unpaid. The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War may dispose of any such bonds so received to public or private agencies or entities on such terms as they may deem and find advantageous.

(c) Moneys in the fund advanced under subdivision (b) shall be available only for expenditures for construction, and for the payment of interest during construction and for 1 year thereafter, on any amounts loaned as herein provided; Provided, That any amount loaned as herein authorized may be expended by said Water Project Authority for any purpose authorized by said Central Valley Project Act.

(d) The Secretary of the Treasury shall charge the fund as of June 30, in each year, with such amount as may be necessary for the payment of interest on any loan, or portion thereof, made under subdivision (b) at the rate of 4 percent per annum accrued during the year upon the amounts so advanced and remaining unpaid, except that if the fund is insufficient to meet such payment of interest the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, defer any part of such payment, and the amount so deferred shall bear interest at the rate of 4 percent per annum until paid.

(e) The Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, at the close of each fiscal year, the amount of money in the fund in excess of the amount necessary to meet the requirements for funds of the construction program for said project. Upon receipt of each such certificate the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to charge the fund with the amount so certified as repayment of or credit on any of the advances made under subdivision (b), which amount shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 6. Before any money is appropriated for the purposes of this act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War shall require the submission by the Water Project Authority of contracts for the furnishing, disposal, or use of water and electric energy or other facilities to be made available by the operation of said project, establishing revenues in such amounts as they shall deem sufficient to demonstrate the ability of said Water Project Authority to pay any and all expense of operation and maintenance of said project and to repay to said fund any and all amounts loaned, together with interest thereon, as herein provided, having and giving due consideration to any showing which may be made or presented by said Water Project Authority indicating future growth of population in said Sacramento and San Joaquin River Basins, industrial expansion therein, and consequent future increased demand for such facilities to be made available by the operation of said project, which may be reasonably anticipated.

HISTORY OF PLAN

Without any effort to go too deeply into the subject at this time, but in order that you might have some information on the background of this project, let me recount a bit of history and a few comparisons associated with the Central Valley project and advise you of its value from a social and economic standpoint.

The two greatest valleys in California, named the San Joaquin Valley and the Sacramento Valley, together form what is known as the "Central Valley of California." The Central Valley of California is as big in land area as any one of 20 certain States of the Union, and to emphasize my statement let me point out that you could place the States of New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts combined within its borders and still have enough room left over to tuck several areas the size of the District of Columbia into unoccupied corners.

Thirty years or so ago the Central Valley of California was a veritable Garden of Eden. Today it is one of the greatest agricultural areas in all the world. It is one of the greatest irrigation districts in the world. Quarter of a century ago centrifugal pumps drew plenty of water from a depth of less than 30 feet to supply the thirsty agricultural fields, and it appeared that the watersheds of the surrounding mountain areas would furnish enough of this irrigation water to satisfy any additional development of farm lands.

Farsighted ones, however, realized that lowering water levels, fire-denuded watersheds, and the growing agricultural activities and population would bring about a crisis within a few decades—and today, 30 years later, that crisis is arrived. The Central Valley of California, under present conditions, definitely has reached its agricultural peak, and unless our lands are flooded with excess water from the north and the sea is barred from encroaching upon the Sacramento Valley, retrogression is due before long. In the San Joaquin Valley there is not enough water to supply the agricultural areas, and in most places the water being used is so many hundreds of feet underground, the cost of boosting above the earth is prohibitive.

If you could come with me into the San Joaquin Valley, the bread basket of California, I could show you how it is reverting to the desert, slowly, to be sure, but most certainly. Orchards and vinelands on the outer edge of the valley have been abandoned and are turning into waste land. In the valley's interior the fertile but arid soil is dying of thirst. Unless we can obtain additional water and power, at reasonable rates, the San Joaquin Valley will become only a long arm of the Mojave Desert. Picture the plight of this particular valley—a world granary for cotton, grapes, fruits, and nuts, and almost every other type of product agriculturally grown in this country, with a total acreage which exceeds the combined acreage of Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Delaware, being surrendered to an encroaching desert. We cannot afford to allow a natural food bin of this magnitude to revert to a sandy waste. Such procedure would not prove sound economics and would be contrary to our current social agendum.

While the problem faced by the Sacramento Valley is not precisely the same as that which the San Joaquin Valley must countenance, yet the Sacramento Valley is in a dangerous position from invasion by the sea. During the freshwater period the fresh excess water escapes to the sea, and at various times the salt sea water invades the Sacramento Valley agricultural areas. A salt water barrier at the mouth of the Sacramento River would provide a solution for that particular problem.

Both valleys, however, have two great interests in common in this project. It would provide cheap power for both and increase the navigability of two great rivers, the San Joaquin River in the San Joaquin Valley and the Sacramento River in the Sacramento Valley.

Powerful interests have opposed this project since its inception in the minds of men 30 years ago, but its worth from a social and economic standpoint is self-evident. Thousands of men could be put to work immediately in digging the canals, building the pump stations, and constructing the dams which are units in the project.

SPECIFIC PURPOSES OF PROJECT

As reported, the general purpose of the Central Valley project is to develop more stable and secure economic and social conditions in the Central Valley of California, while the more specific purposes as originally defined and deduced from documents dealing with the subject are:

First. (a) To provide adequate water for irrigation of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys to land already under development.

(b) To provide a flow of sufficient fresh water to the delta lands of the San Joaquin and Sacramento Rivers, to check salinity from the increasing invasion of salt water from San Francisco Bay, which is ruining profitably used truck-farming lands.

Second. To provide power for pumping water for these purposes and to provide power for general use throughout a good portion of California.

Third. To improve navigation of the San Joaquin and Sacramento Rivers.

Fourth. To control floods in the Sacramento River.

Fifth. To provide an adequate supply of water to the industrial and municipal areas of Contra Costa County.

Sixth. To provide irrigation water for the future development of agricultural lands in the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys.

The proposed project, estimated to cost $170,000,000, includes the construction of a series of dams, reservoirs, power plants, canals, pumping stations, transmission lines, and irrigation systems in the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys.

The project is divided into six units.

Unit 1: The Kennett Dam unit comprises the Kennett Dam, reservoir, and power plant, and the Kennett transmission line, which includes a substation at Antioch, the approximate center of power load for the area served.

The Kennett Dam would be located in section 15, township 35 north, range 5 west, in Shasta County, about 13 miles above Redding. This will be a gravity concrete dam 460 feet high above low water, 315 feet thick at the base, and 2,430 feet long on the crest. It will be equipped with gate-controlled overflow spillways and gate-controlled flood-control outlets. The reservoir created will flood 23,000,000 acres of land and store 3,980,000 acre-feet of water. The Kennett power plant, located at the dam, will have an installed capacity of 275,000 kilovolt-amperes.

The Keswick Afterbay Dam will be constructed about 8.7 miles downstream from the Kennett Dam and will serve to regulate to uniform flow the irregular discharge from the Kennett power plant. The Keswick Dam will be a gravity concrete dam 95 feet high and will have an installed capacity of 50,000 kilovolt-amperes.

The Kennett transmission line will run from Kennett and Keswick power plants to a substation at Antioch, in Contra Costa County. The line will be some 200 miles long and comprise 3 circuits with a transmission voltage of 220,000 volts and have a capacity of 260,000 kilowatts.

As a part of this unit it is proposed to construct the Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta cross channel, which will consist of a dam across the Sacramento near Hood, equipped with navigation locks, a controlling headgate on the left bank of the river above the dam, and a dredged channel connecting Sacramento River with Mokelumme River and its branches to Central Landing on the San Joaquin River. These works will provide for the introduction of Kennett Reservoir water into the San Joaquin Delta and used for salinity control and for diversion by units nos. 2 and 3.

Unit 2: The fresh water maintained by release from Kennett Reservoir into the channels of the San Joaquin Delta will be pumped into the Contra Costa conduit, the capacity of which will vary from 120 second-feet at the intake, near Knightsen, to 20 second-feet at the end. This water will be lifted in successive steps by six pumping plants, and will be conveyed in most part in an open concrete canal, and a branch pipe line of 5 second-feet capacity will extend from Bay Point to Martinez. The Contra Costa conduit will supply water to the manufacturing and agricultural areas along the south shore of Suisun Bay.

Unit 3: The San Joaquin pumping system will be built in two sections. The first will consist of a series of five dams and pumping plants on the low San Joaquin River, and will, by successive lifts from a lower dam to an upper, deliver water from tide level to an elevation of 62 feet at Hills Ferry, 86 miles above Stockton.

The second section will consist of five pumping plants and a concrete-lined canal to move the water 96 miles to Mendota to an elevation of 180 feet near Los Banos and will furnish water to lands now irrigated by the San Joaquin River.

The project proposes to divert San Joaquin water into Friant, Kern, and Madera Canals at Friant Dam, 61 miles upstream from Mendota and 308 feet higher in elevation.

Unit 4: Friant Dam and Reservoir will be located on the San Joaquin River in section 5, township 11 south, range 21 east, in Madera and Fresno Counties. It will be 252 feet high, 190 feet thick at the base, and 3,800 feet long at the crest. It will be equipped with gate-controlled spillways and gate-controlled outlets. The reservoir will flood 4,200 acres of land and will have a capacity of 270,000 acre-feet.

Unit 5: The Madera Canal will be a concrete-lined canal, extending 35 miles from Friant Dam to Chowchilla River and will have a capacity of 1,500 second-feet. Water will be delivered by gravity to irrigated and producing lands in Madera County.

Unit 6: Friant-Kern Canal will be, for the greater part, a concrete-lined canal extending 157 miles from Friant Dam to Kern River. It will have a capacity of 3,000 second-feet and will divert water from Friant Dam to irrigated and producing lands in Fresno, Tulare, Kings, and Kern Counties, now suffering from lack of adequate water supplies. A small additional pumping plant will serve the East Side Canal in Kern County.

GREAT AREAS AT STAKE

The fate of 20 great counties is at stake. Some of these counties are as big as a State of the Union—for instance, Kern County, which is larger than the State of Massachusetts, while 8 of the 20 counties each are larger than the State of Delaware. Approximately 1,000,000 persons reside in the Central Valley. There is a farm population which almost reaches 300,000 persons, and the present farm-land area, which includes land both irrigated and nonirrigated, totals approximately 14,000,000 acres, an area about the size of West Virginia. The value of the farm acreage, based on the last census report, exceeds $1,000,000,000.

I should like to present a chart, which shows the counties involved in this project, the land areas, total population, and farm population for each:

Counties involved in the Central Valley project

| | Land area (acres) | Total population | Farm population |

For your information, the land area in the Central Valley is 28.3 percent of the State's total area (which otherwise largely is mountainous while the Central Valley is a vast plain), the total population of the Central Valley is 16.9 percent of the State's total population, while the farm population in the Central Valley represents 46.2 percent, or almost half of the State's total farm population.

The present farm acreages, including irrigable and nonirrigable areas, and the farm acreage values by counties are:

The entire cost of the Central Valley project is far less than the annual crop production of the area for 1 year. The entire cost of the project is about half the combined annual value of the crop production, the annual value of livestock products, and the current value of livestock on farms—all agricultural activities which depend upon a sufficient supply of water for existence.

PROJECT IS WARRANTED

It is evident that the cost of the project is warranted if from no other standpoint than from agricultural production values. In addition to the agricultural values involved, we must remember that there are almost 400,000 city residents in the Central Valley, who depend upon agricultural pursuits directly or indirectly, and to permit the agricultural areas to deteriorate would mean the evacuation of many great cities and scores of smaller communities. It is needless for me to point out, too, that hundreds of millions in investments in farm, city, and industrial buildings are predicated upon continued agricultural security of the area.

I have a chart, showing the value of all crops for the last census year (1929), the value of the livestock on the farms for 1930, and the value of the livestock products for 1 year, county by county, with grand totals:

Value of all crops for the last census year (1929)

There are some who may believe that this project is intended to increase agricultural production areas. Let me hasten to correct any such belief. We do not propose to add a single acre to the present production area and will not do so unless the Nation requires such development.

PROJECT COMPLIES WITH ADMINISTRATION PROGRAM

I do not believe the Congress, the administration, or any other Federal agency cares to stand idly by while an area of this magnitude faces the same fate which is now bringing ruin to northern and midwestern areas. Every high wind that blows from the east to the Pacific Ocean carries with it millions of tons of our dry and thirsty soil, and unless we get this water, time will find our top soil being deposited by the winds against the sides of surrounding mountains or carried to the sea to mingle with the muck and mire of the ocean bed.

I have discussed this subject in a preliminary fashion principally from a social and economic standpoint. The project, of course, is one of the most ambitious engineering programs of all time. There are many opposing interests who would obstacle our path to completion of the project with the claim that it is not feasible from an engineering standpoint. The finest engineers in California, and the Nation, however, have joined almost unanimously in declaring that it is practical. For several years the Board of Army Engineers has been interested in the Kennett Dam unit from a flood control and navigation development standpoint. Maj. Gen. E. M. Markham, Chief of the Army Board of Engineers, and fellow officials placed the stamp of approval on the project last year, in a report to the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors (Doc. No. 35, House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, 73d Cong., 2d sess.). Major General Markham believes that the Federal Government should be interested in this one unit alone to the extent of providing $12,000,000 to assist in the construction of Kennett Dam in order to increase the navigability of the San Joaquin and Sacramento Rivers and to provide flood control.

This immense project has been under review by the Public Works Administration for the past 18 months, and now is being reviewed by the National Resources Board under direct command of President Roosevelt, but this is the first time it has reached the floor of Congress. I confess that $170,000,000 is a great sum of money to seek even in these days of largess on the part of a benevolent Federal administration, and I am cognizant of the fact that a great task lies before those of us who are working toward the common goal, and I know that similar great undertakings such as Boulder Dam required years before Federal financial assistance was forthcoming.

However, the time is ripe. We need the project and our Government needs practical projects through which it might develop its social and economic long-range planning program. The project will support itself financially. It would provide work for several thousand skilled workers, laborers, and professional folk. It will save a great agricultural and industrial area from economic oblivion. The multitude of major and minor problems which arise in the creation of any such project have been eliminated or corrected during the 30 years it has been under development. I can find no legitimate reason for delay in the consideration of this bill.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE HENRY T. RAINEY

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 57

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay all the expenses in connection with the funeral of the late Speaker Henry T. Rainey, and such sum as may be found necessary to carry out the purpose of this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LATE WILLIAM BRADY

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 48 (Rept. No. 9)

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Thomas Brady, father of William Brady, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said William Brady.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLOAKROOM EMPLOYEE

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 36 (Rept. No. 10)

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House is authorized to appoint a successor to the laborer authorized and named in the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted December 19, 1901, at a rate of compensation of $1,380 per annum.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell us what this resolution is and what the necessity is for it?

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman will recollect that there has been in the Democratic cloakroom a colored man named Albert, who was taken care of by special resolution passed in 1901. He was named in that resolution. He is now dead, and, of course, his successor cannot be appointed except by resolution authorizing it. It creates no new position, merely permits the filling of that position.

Mr. SNELL. I have understood that where a resolution named a man for a special position that when that man died the position died with him.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman understands that in the cloakroom on the Republican side there is a man to take care of the hats and coats. This man filled that position in the cloakroom on the Democratic side. Since control passed to this side of the House in the Seventy-second Congress we have not created a new position up to this time; we have never increased the salary of any employee and have actually abolished some positions.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection to the work of the Committee on Accounts, but I am wondering about positions of this kind, where resolutions are passed for the special purpose of taking care of some individual, whether they are always continued, in the event of the death of that particular individual.

Mr. WARREN. These are two necessary places, one to the minority and one to the majority. He is the man who takes care of the hats and coats as we come in. The man on our side is dead. There is no provision to fill his place, because of the fact that he was named in this resolution to which I have referred. The resolution I now present merely provides that the Doorkeeper of the House shall appoint his successor.

Mr. SNELL. Then this was not a new position when this man took it?

Mr. WARREN. It always has been on each side.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This position has existed since 1901?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; with this same man holding it.

Mr. BLANTON. And a similar position exists in the minority cloakroom, and if that colored man over there now filling it were to die my friend from New York [Mr. SNELL] would want the Chairman of the Committee on Accounts to bring in exactly the same kind of a resolution to appoint a successor in his place to wait on our Republican friends over there, look after their hats and coats and canes and overshoes? Is not that the case?

Mr. SNELL. I wanted to find out what it was.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to; and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

THE LATE ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the funeral of our beloved colleague, Hon. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN, of New York, is being held in New York City this morning. The body is being brought to Washington this afternoon on the 1 o'clock train. This evening the body will lie in the Lee funeral chapel at Massachusetts Avenue and Fourth Street NE., just a short distance from the House Office Buildings. Tomorrow morning at 10: 30 o'clock services will be held at the Lee funeral chapel, after which the body of our friend will be taken to Arlington Cemetery for burial, he having had a distinguished career as a soldier.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3973) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes. Pending that I suggest that general debate upon the bill be limited to 4 hours, half to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] and half by myself, if that is agreeable to him.

Mr. DITTER. That is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to 4 hours, half to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] and half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise today briefly to point out some of the confusion and chaos which exists relative to what is known as "administrative rules and regulations." These rules and regulations, vast and mighty in number and influence, are in a certain sense administrative law. Administrative law, roughly, is that vast body of rules and regulations, proclamations, circulars, bulletins, memoranda, notices, decrees, and orders issued by the executive departments. It is almost impossible because of the failure of proper promulgation of those orders and their publication oftentimes to find out what they really are. These rules and regulations have the force and effect of law as though they were solemnly enacted in this Chamber, and oftentimes carry with their violations very severe pains and penalties and imprisonment. One can realize how necessary it is to have these rules and regulations codified and classified so that you or I may go to some place like the Library of Congress, the Attorney General's Office, or the library of the Supreme Court and find out what they really are. However, there is a woeful lack of such facility today. The whole business of the making, issue, promulgation, publication, filing, and permanence of these rules, orders, and decrees is a veritable hocus-pocus.

I read from an article, Government in Ignorance of the Law—A Plea for Better Publication of Executive Legislation, in the Harvard Law Review of December, by Prof. Erwin N. Griswold, wherein he points out that—

> Administrative regulations "equivalent to law" have become important elements in the ordering of our lives today. Many cases have reiterated the rule that Executive regulations properly made "have the force and effect of law." The volume of these rulings has so increased that full, accurate, and prompt information of administrative activity is now quite as important to the citizen and to his legal adviser as is knowledge of the product of the congressional mill. There should consequently be no need to demonstrate the importance and necessity of providing a reasonable means of distributing and preserving the texts of this Executive-made law.
> The President of the United States alone issued 674 Executive orders, aggregating approximately 1,400 pages of solid type in the first 15 months after March 4, 1933.

Where are those Executive orders? Strange to relate, if one goes to the White House, where they might repose, or to the State Department, where they should repose, one cannot find many of them. Yet those Executive orders are of vast importance. Professor Griswold goes on to say that these 1,400 pages of Executive orders constitute a greater volume than that of the preceding 4 years and nearly six times as great as that for the 39 years from 1862 through to 1900.

This is what the American Bar Association has to say on the subject:

> The practice of filing Executive orders with the Department of State is not uniformly or regularly followed, and the totals are really greater than those [which I have just] indicated. Some orders are retained or buried in the files of Government departments. * * *

One realizes the importance of what I say when a man in a particular case in one of our States was convicted of violation of an Executive order. An indictment was brought against him. He was convicted. The case went to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals and was affirmed. It went to the United States Supreme Court, and, lo and behold, somebody discovered that the Executive order had been repealed. The Government then, of course, asked dismissal of the indictment improperly brought. See U. S. v. Smith, No. 3, October term, 1934, United States Supreme Court. This defendant had suffered many difficulties, had gone to the expense of hiring a lawyer to plead his case, and had this conviction hanging over his head for months before it was discovered that no such Executive order was in existence. In other words, officers of the Government frequently do not know the existence or nonexistence of applicable regulations. Some orders are retained and buried in the voluminous files of the Government departments, some are confidential and are not published; yet if you violate them, you may go to jail. The practice as to printing and publication of orders are not uniform. Often they are published in separate paper pamphlets. Sometimes they are merely mimeographed. Often, like Executive orders of the President, they are printed on a single sheet of paper, which, as likely as not, is fragile and easily lost. To compile all of them would be quite impossible save by some governmental agency.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the majority join with the minority in abolishing government by Executive order?

Mr. CELLER. Well, we cannot do that, and I do not think the gentleman would want that himself; but I will come to a remedy a little later in my remarks.

To continue the statement of the American Bar Association:

Some orders are made known and available rather promptly after their approval; the publication of others may be delayed a month or more, with consequent confusion in numbering. The comparatively large number of recent orders which incorporate provisions purporting to impose criminal penalties by way of fines and imprisonment for violation is without numerical precedent in the history of the Government.

That is what the American Bar Association says.

"In the first year of the National Recovery Administration 2,998 administrative orders were issued", says Professor Griswold.

Where are they? Go to the N. R. A. and try to find out something about those Executive orders, those rules and regulations. There is hopeless confusion.

In addition to these the Recovery Administration has adopted numerous regulations and sets of regulations which are to be found scattered among 5,991 press releases.

You must go to the public prints in most cases to get the wording of many of these rules and regulations and Executive orders of the National Recovery Administration.

It has been estimated that the total amount of "law" evolved during the first year of the N. R. A.'s activities exceeds 10,000 pages, probably a greater volume than the total amount of statute law contained in the United States Code.

Now, what of the A. A. A.? Regulation upon regulation has been issued by that body. Try to find some of them. You will have your hands full. Yet some man in your State, some man in Kansas, some man in Alabama, some man in California—unwittingly, without knowledge on the part of himself or his community or his lawyer or you—will violate these rules or regulations and suddenly find himself clapped in jail.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Since there is so much being done in regulating the life and habits of the people by Executive orders and departmental regulations, does the gentleman not think that a department, when it issues regulations, and the President, when he issues Executive orders, ought to be required to have it published and furnished through the document room?

Mr. CELLER. I am coming to that. I introduced a bill which was written by Erwin N. Griswold, of the faculty of the Harvard Law School, which covers the point. It is H. R. 2884, called the "Statutory Rules and Regulations Publication Act, 1935." It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., This act may be cited as the "Statutory Rules and Regulations Publication Act, 1935."

SEC. 2. As used in this act—

The term "statutory rules and regulations" means—

(a) Proclamations by the President; (b) all Executive orders by the President, including all instances of the exercise by the President of any power conferred on him by statute; (c) all rules and regulations, by whatever name called, promulgated by any executive department, administration, independent establishment, board, commission, official, group of officials, or other rule-making authority; and (d) all other rules, regulations or orders, by whatever name called, made directly or indirectly under the expressed or implied authority of any act of Congress.

The term "rule-making authority" includes every authority authorized to make any statutory rules and regulations.

SEC. 3. (a) All statutory rules and regulations made after the effective date of this act shall forthwith after they are made be sent to the Public Printer, and shall, in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of State and the Attorney General, with the approval of the President, be numbered in consecutive whole numbers (the numbers to start anew annually), and, except as provided by the regulations, printed and sold by him.

(b) Regulations made under the authority of this section may provide for the different treatment of statutory rules and regulations which are of the nature of public acts and of those which are of the nature of personal or private acts; and may determine the classes of cases in which the exercise of a statutory power by any rule-making authority relates solely to the internal administration of an agency of the Government; and may provide for the exemption from this section of any such classes; except that no regulation shall be made dispensing with the requirement that any statutory rule or regulation subject to the provisions of section 8 of this act shall be printed. Regulations made under this section may provide that statutory rules and regulations relating exclusively to territories, insular possessions, or the District of Columbia, shall not be published, or may be published in a separate series. Regulations made under this section may also provide for the separate publication of all statutory rules and regulations relating exclusively to the Patent Office.

SEC. 4. Any statutory rules and regulations may, without prejudice to any other mode of citation, be cited by the number assigned to them as provided in section 3 (a), together with the calendar year. Printed copies of statutory rules and regulations, bearing the imprint of the Government Printing Office, shall be the subject of judicial notice in all the courts of the United States, and of the several States, territories, and possessions.

SEC. 5. (a) The provisions of this act shall also be applicable to all rules and general orders of courts of the United States, whether issued pursuant to an authority granted by an act of Congress or not. The clerk of any court promulgating any such rules or orders shall send them forthwith to the Public Printer, who shall assign to them their appropriate number in the annual series of statutory rules and regulations and shall print and sell them. All such rules and general orders of courts shall be included in the compilations and indexes to be prepared under sections 6 and 7 of this act.

(b) The regulations made under section 3 of this act may provide that the requirement of printing contained in this section shall not be applicable to the rules of district courts.

SEC. 6. At the close of each calendar year, the Public Printer, under regulations made as provided in section 3 (b) of this act, shall have compiled and printed a compilation of the statutory rules and regulations, and rules and general orders of courts, for that year, together with a complete index and appropriate tables. There shall be included in this annual volume a list by number and title of all statutory rules and regulations which, pursuant to the regulations aforesaid, are not printed in full. The annual volume provided for by this section shall be made available to the public by the 1st of March of the following year.

SEC. 7. The Attorney General, with the aid of the Librarian of Congress, is authorized and directed to have compiled and published at the Government Printing Office a complete collection of all statutory rules and regulations and rules and general orders of courts which are in force at the date this act takes effect. This compilation shall be printed in a style which is uniform with annual volumes of statutory rules and regulations to be published as provided in section 6 of this act. In making and publishing this compilation, the Attorney General, with the aid of the Librarian of Congress, may, in his discretion, omit any statutory rules and regulations and any rules and general orders of courts which are of the classes which need not be printed under the regulations established under sections 3 (b) and 5 (b) of this act.

SEC. 8. No statutory rule or regulation establishing an offense or defining an act which pursuant to an act of Congress is punishable as a crime (whether a petty offense, misdemeanor, or felony), or subject to a penalty, shall be valid and effective until published as provided in section 3 of this act.

SEC. 9. The 25th paragraph of section 73 of the act of January 12, 1895 (ch. 23, 28 Stat., pp. 601, 615; U. S. C., title 1, sec. 30), is amended by striking out the word "proclamations." So much of the act of July 31, 1876 (ch. 246, 19 Stat., pp. 102, 105; U. S. C., title 44, sec. 321), as requires the publication of proclamations in a newspaper is repealed.

SEC. 10. Nothing in this act shall affect the validity or effect of any statutory rules or regulations which are in effect or have been in effect prior to the effective date of this act.

SEC. 11. This act shall take effect 2 months following its enactment. The regulations provided for in section 3 of this act shall be established prior to such effective date.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MAY. Has the gentleman read a bill that has been introduced in the Senate to establish a court for the purpose of construing and administering regulations and Executive orders of the Government?

Mr. CELLER. I am sorry I have not read that, but I do believe we are coming to a situation in this country which France has come to, where there are two sets of courts, as it were, one for legislative law and one for administrative law; the administrative law embodying all these rules, regulations, and decrees of the various executive departments; and in France they have a separate court to interpret and evaluate and determine what shall be done concerning these rules and regulations concerning administrative law.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Would the gentleman not be willing to go further and say that these rules and regulations ought to be codified the same as the laws of Congress?

Mr. CELLER. I meant to say that in answer to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]. They shall be codified. My bill provides for it. I believe that the rules and regulations heretofore issued, which now have the force and effect of law, probably occupy tens of thousands of pages. They cover every conceivable branch of our Government, and nobody knows where or what they are. Nobody knows what they are until some enterprising clerk in a department wants to get after somebody and he resurrects some old regulation and then there is difficulty.

Mr. DONDERO. Does the gentleman believe that is the way we should legislate?

Mr. CELLER. No; I do not believe we should, and that is why I offered this resolution in order to bring order out of chaos and destroy this confusion which now exists. I have been besieged time and again by constituents of mine who want to know something about these rules and regulations of the various departments, and I can furnish very little information.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I, too, am in sympathy with the purpose the gentleman is trying to accomplish, but I want to ask how much relief it would be to the average citizen to give him the opportunity to dig through a hundred thousand pages—is that what the gentleman stated?

Mr. CELLER. There might be that number.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Even if they were of record in the office of the Secretary of State. Would not many of them inadvertently violate some of those provisions and make themselves subject to some criminal prosecution?

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is correct. But at least there would be knowledge of the regulations and their provisions.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I do not believe we should have laws making the violation of an Executive order a crime for which a man might be punishable.

Mr. CELLER. That is something that ought to be reasoned out carefully and considered.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It seems to me we are in a somewhat anomalous position as a free nation when we require every one of our 125,000,000 citizens to dig through 100,000 pages or more of Executive orders filed in the office of the Secretary of State in Washington in order to keep out of jail.

Mr. CELLER. I am not entirely in accord with the gentleman's statement, but I do feel that careful consideration should be given the matter.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I noticed a statement in the press that more than 10,000 Executive orders have been issued during the present administration. Is this information correct?

Mr. CELLER. I obtained my information from the Harvard Law Review. I believe the figures I gave you are accurate.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How many of these were actually issued by the President?

Mr. CELLER. The statement says 1,400 pages involving 674 Executive orders had been issued up to the 4th of March 1933, and that during the first 15 months after that date he has issued even more than that. From March 4, 1933, to October 15, 1934, the President issued 949 Executive orders. The report indicates something like 10,000 pages from the N. R. A. alone, let alone the orders from the many other departments.

Judging from the interest of the Members, I take it there is sympathy for the classification and codification of these regulations, and I shall not take more of the time of the House except to indicate what I am striving for now and which I am sure you will be striving for, namely, the carrying out of a plan which has been accomplished in every Anglo-Saxon country of the world, England, Canada, New Zealand, British India, Australia, South Africa; France has a complete codification of all the rules and regulations that have ever been issued in that country. Official gazettes containing these rules are frequently published in Latin countries.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, confirming what the gentleman said, I observed, and doubtless he has, too, that one Federal judge held up action in a case in a western State because the party depending upon an Executive order could not produce it.

Mr. CELLER. That is exactly the point I am trying to make. You will find the same situation existing in other jurisdictions. I, personally, have already been interested in the trial of a case where the defendant was alleged to have been a violator of rules and regulations. We could not find the regulation for a long period.

The vice of the whole situation of haphazard making and publishing Executive orders is all the more brought out in sharp relief when you consider the many departments and agencies issuing them. There is the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. The regulations from this Agricultural Adjustment Administration, which cover hundreds, if not thousands, of pages, are all the more complicated by amendments, substitutions, and supplements. In the Treasury Department there are the customs regulations and the internal-revenue regulations, all in a constant state of flux. The Labor Department has its immigration rules and regulations. In the Post Office Department you will find a huge, bulky volume of rules. They are constantly being amended. The Veterans' Administration already has two large volumes of regulations, many of which already are out of date. There are the elaborate and voluminous pure food and drug regulations. Then there are the Federal Farm Board, Securities and Exchange Commission, Federal Communications Commission, Federal Housing Administration, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Federal Farm Loan Board, Civil Service Commission, Farm Credit Administration, all issuing their own regulations having the full force and effect of law. It all becomes a mystic maze. Often a statute is passed by us which makes direct reference to a set of previous rules and regulations. Therefore, unless you can readily find and have knowledge of the rules referred to, the effect of the statute is meaningless. Proper codification of these rules will bring them within range and make the statute based upon them understandable.

We have often authorized executive officers to decide when a statute shall become effective or when its operation shall be suspended. Executive orders in such instances are of primary importance and should be easily ascertainable.

We have often passed statutes giving the right through Executive orders to amend or repeal our acts. In such cases, it is of paramount importance to know where to locate the Executive orders thus amending or repealing our acts.

It is perfectly legal for us to declare that violations of the Executive orders shall be criminal offenses. This power has been upheld in many cases. (See U. S. v. Gremand, 220 U. S. 506 (1911); McKinley v. U. S., 249 U. S. 397 (1919); Avent v. U. S., 266 U. S. 127 (1924).)

The very first act that we passed in the Seventy-third Congress, on the first day of the special session, was an act granting to the President the power to prescribe regulations concerning gold. We made the violation of these Presidential regulations a criminal offense, subjecting the violator to a fine of $10,000 or to imprisonment for not more than 10 years. In fact, numerous prosecutions have been brought under this statute. (See U. S. v. Campbell, 5 F. Supp. 156; S. D. N. Y. 1933.)

We can quickly lay our hands upon any legislative enactment. They are found in bound volumes called "Statutes at Large." Aside from the official compilations, there are many private and independent compilations. Not so with the mystic maze of rules, orders, circulars, memoranda, and bulletins of the executive departments. They are everywhere and therefore nowhere. They should be compiled and properly published. There must be an official publication of these rules and regulations analogous to our bound volumes entitled "Statutes at Large", where all the regulations can be systematically published, easily ascertainable, easily accessible, easily found. My bill, H. R. 2884, provides the remedy.

To go to an appropriate department for an order, rule, or regulation and not find it is nothing short of barbarous and shocking.

I hope the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I am a member, will deal with this subject in my bill before long. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I have today introduced a bill to authorize appropriations for the improvement of navigation and the control of destructive flood waters of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers in the State of California.

The expenditures of these moneys will be intrusted to the Central Valley water authority under the terms of this bill, a State authority created by the people of California through their legislature and approved by the people at a referendum election.

An identical bill has been introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS]. The gentleman from California referred to this bill a few moments ago in his request for permission to extend his remarks.

The text of the bills will be printed in connection with the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. STUBBS].

These bills follow the lines suggested by the Engineering Department of the State of California. It is my intention, as soon as certain details are perfected, to introduce for myself a second bill which will authorize the creation of a strictly Federal authority along the lines of the Tennessee Valley Authority, which will be directed to perform the same work of the protection of irrigation development, of flood control and navigation on these rivers, and the production of power as contemplated by the bills introduced today. I sincerely hope the Members of Congress will take these bills to heart and study them seriously, compare them in their two different methods, so that if it becomes necessary to legislate seriously on these questions the Members may be fully informed of what is in the minds of our people, and consider what will be best for the welfare of that great territory, the Central Valley region of California. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain official statements made by different people in relation to the reciprocal tariff.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

REPEAL OF THE PRESIDENT'S AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, under the Reciprocal Tariff Act the Congress has surrendered its power over the tariff to the Executive, and we now find the latter, through his representative, the Secretary of State, sitting down with representatives of foreign countries to formulate this country's tariff policy. In other words, we have the amazing situation of foreign nations having more to say about this country's affairs than the elected representatives of the people.

AGREEMENT WITH CUBA

For example, under the trade agreement which the President recently concluded with Cuba, of which Congress had no knowledge until it was put into effect, the tariff rates on a large number of articles have been reduced in return for reciprocal concessions by Cuba. It so happens that many of the reductions have a very detrimental effect upon certain agricultural and industrial sections of the country.

CONCESSIONS

Among the concessions made, in addition to the existing 20-percent differential in favor of Cuban products generally, are reductions of 40 percent in the duty on sugar; 37½ percent on filler tobacco; 17.6 percent on wrapper tobacco; 37½ percent on cigars and cigarettes; 50 percent on honey, corn, lima beans, Irish potatoes, cucumbers, eggplant, okra, limes, grapefruit, and pineapples; 25 percent on tomatoes and peppers; 40 to 50 percent on certain kinds of sponges; 37½ percent on rum; and 50 percent on cement floor and wall tiles.

SUGAR

I want for a moment to refer to a few of these items. Take the case of sugar. Under the Tariff Act of 1930 the duty on 96° sugar was fixed at 2.5 cents per pound, and by virtue of the Cuban preference the duty on 96° Cuban sugar was 2 cents per pound. On May 9, 1934, President Roosevelt reduced the general rate to 1.875 cents per pound under the flexible-tariff provisions. The Cuban rate thereby became 1.5 cents. Under the reciprocal agreement recently concluded with Cuba, the President has further reduced the rate on Cuban sugar to nine-tenths of 1 cent per pound. This is 1.1 cents per pound less than the rate originally provided by Congress in the Tariff Act of 1930 and is equivalent to a reduction of 55 percent below that rate.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. My time is going to be very short if I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. This might be a very pertinent inquiry.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. It might be pertinent to note that Vincent Astor is one of the most heavily interested Americans in Cuban sugar.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have no knowledge of that fact, but undoubtedly the gentleman is correct in his statement.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, but I must decline to yield further.

Mr. HARLAN. Just as a matter of information, I wonder if the gentleman would include in his remarks in listing the concessions that we have made to Cuba the concessions that Cuba has made to us?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should like to know the concessions that have been made by Cuba to our industries.

Mr. HARLAN. I would be interested in the concessions that Cuba has made to us.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am interested in our people, not the Cuban folks.

This reduction in the duty on sugar is made at the expense of the cane producers of Louisiana and Texas, and the sugar-beet farmers of Colorado, Michigan, Utah, Nebraska, California, Idaho, Ohio, and other States. It has not redounded to the benefit of the consumers of this country, but has gone to increase the profits of the American capitalists who control the production of sugar in Cuba.

POTATOES

Take the item of potatoes. The rate on Cuban potatoes has been reduced to 30 cents per hundredweight during the 3 months of each year beginning December 1. The statutory rate on potatoes, as fixed by Congress in the Tariff Act of 1930, is 75 cents. Thus the reduction amounts to 60 percent of the established rate. Of course, the President is limited to a reduction of 50 percent, but in the case of Cuba this limitation applies to the existing preference rate, which was 60 cents per hundredweight.

Now, what sections are going to be harmed by this concession. Maine, of course, is by far the largest domestic producer of Irish potatoes. Other important producing States are Idaho, Minnesota, New York, North Dakota, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Vermont, Nebraska, Michigan, and Washington. The potato farmers in these States are being forced to give up a certain portion of the domestic market to Cuban potato producers in order that some other domestic industries may have freer access to the Cuban market. While the reduction in duty applies during only 3 months of the year, this is sufficient to destroy the domestic price structure and thereby reduce the income of our own producers.

TRADE WITH CUBA

Let us look at the statistics concerning our trade with Cuba. In 1929, this country spent $209,000,000 in Cuba, principally for sugar, while that country took about $127,000,000 of our products. In 1933, the ratio was $58,000,000 to $25,000,000, or more than 2 to 1 against this country. Under the trade agreement recently consummated, the State Department hopes to increase our exports to Cuba. But at what price? By increasing our purchases of Cuban sugar, to the detriment of our own producers in all sections of the country. The State Department does not hope to get a balance of trade in our favor, because that would be virtually impossible. We simply increase our purchases in Cuba and piously hope that Cuba will buy more from us. In the end, instead of spending $2 in Cuba for every $1 of trade we receive in return, we probably will be spending $3 or $4.

Our farmers will no doubt be interested to note that practically all of the concessions granted to Cuban products relate to agriculture. In addition to the cane growers, the sugar-beet producers, and the potato farmers, many other agricultural producers will be adversely affected. The producers of winter vegetables, such as tomatoes, cucumbers, eggplant, okra, peppers, and squash, in the whole tier of Southern States will have a diminished domestic market and lower prices. The tobacco producers in a large number of States, including my own, will find their domestic market curtailed by increased importations of Cuban tobacco and tobacco products at greatly reduced rates. The grapefruit producers of Florida and Texas will have to meet increased competition with a duty of only six-tenths of 1 cent per pound against Cuban grapefruit.

Only a few industrial products are covered in the agreement, owing, of course, to the lack of industrial development in Cuba. However, when the negotiations are completed with some of the European and oriental countries, we may expect to see reductions made in the duties on large numbers of manufactures.

OTHER COUNTRIES

At the present time only one agreement has been concluded—that with Cuba; but negotiations have already been begun with some 15 other nations, including Colombia, Haiti, Brazil, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Belgium, Sweden, Spain, Switzerland, Finland, the Netherlands, and Italy. Preliminary negotiations are doubtless under way with other countries, of which no public notice has as yet been given. Thus we will soon be throwing open our domestic market to the whole world.

STAR-CHAMBER METHODS

In this connection I should like for a few moments to refer to the manner in which these star-chamber negotiations are carried on. The Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act delegates the authority to negotiate the agreements to the President, but, as was expected, he has turned the actual details over to the State Department.

The preliminary negotiations are carried on in secret, behind closed doors. The public has no knowledge of what duties foreign nations seek to have reduced nor of what concessions our representatives seek in return. The first notice given consists in an announcement by the State Department that negotiations are under way with a certain country.

For example, in the case of the recent agreement with Cuba, the following announcement was given out by the Secretary of State on July 3, 1934:

> Pursuant to section 4 of an act of Congress approved June 12, 1934, entitled "An act to amend the Tariff Act of 1930", and Executive Order No. 6750, of June 27, 1934, I hereby give notice of intention to negotiate a foreign-trade agreement with the Government of the Republic of Cuba.

That was all the announcement stated—that this Government had an "intention" of negotiating an agreement with Cuba.

It will be recalled that when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was under consideration in the House, no provision was made for any notice to interested parties even of an "intention" to negotiate an agreement. I offered an amendment to the bill which would have required the President to give interested parties a full hearing on any proposed agreement, but this amendment was voted down by the Democratic majority. However, when the bill reached the other body, the administration forces, realizing the unfairness of the bill in its original form, condescended to require the President to give notice of his intention to negotiate an agreement, without specifying its contents, and to allow industries to present their views to the President or to such agency as he might designate.

After the passage of the act, the President set up the Committee for Reciprocity Information to hear the views of interested parties. This committee is composed of representatives of the several departments, but they have no power other than to receive evidence and transmit it to those carrying on the actual negotiations.

Now, how does this arrangement work out? I have stated that on July 3, 1934, the Secretary of State gave notice of his intention to negotiate an agreement with Cuba. Accompanying that notice was a statement to this effect:

> The Committee for Reciprocity Information has prescribed that all information and views in writing and all applications for supplemental oral presentation of views shall be submitted to the chairman of said committee, care of the United States Tariff Commission, not later than 12 o'clock noon, July 21, 1934. Oral presentation of views by persons whose applications therefor have been approved will be heard July 23, 1934.
> Regulations of the committee governing the form and manner of presenting views in connection with proposed foreign-trade agreements were made public today and also will be published in Press Releases of the Department of State, the weekly Treasury Decisions, and Commerce Reports.

The regulations referred to in the foregoing notice simply provide that information shall be presented to the Committee for Reciprocity Information in the form of written statements, duly sworn to. Supplementary views may be presented to the Committee only upon application to the chairman and after written statements have been submitted in proper form.

Thus we have this situation. On July 3, 1934, notice was given of an intention to negotiate an agreement with Cuba. No intimation was given as to the articles to be dealt with in these negotiations. Yet every domestic industry producing articles and commodities which might be affected by the secret negotiations with Cuba was supposed to present its views to the Committee within 18 days, and to argue its case orally 2 days later—July 23.

No person had any knowledge whatsoever of what was being considered by the committee. Further than that, and I refer to this in some detail, it was almost impossible to gain admission to that hearing on Cuban reciprocity. They did not want the public to know, or the Members of Congress or the country to know, but eventually an agreement was signed between the Secretary of State of the United States and the Secretary of State of Cuba, establishing a law for the government of the people of the United States and taking out from under many of these industries to which I have referred the prop of a tariff protection to which they were entitled.

What happened on the day set for the oral hearings? I was in Massachusetts at the time and consequently was unable to be present, but I had a personal representative attend in my stead. In order for him to gain admission to the hearing, he had to fill out a questionnaire and wait outside while the committee determined whether he should be admitted. Thus even the hearing was not public.

At this hearing were representatives of the fruit and vegetable, tobacco, and sugar industries. They naturally assumed that their products would be dealt with in any negotiations with Cuba, and attempted to show the committee that any reduced tariffs would be detrimental to their respective industries. They did not know for certainty that their products would be affected, or, if so, to what extent reductions would be made. In presenting their cases, they had to "shoot in the dark", so to speak.

A representative of the New England tobacco producers made the statement before the committee that it was only by chance that he had learned of the proposed negotiations with Cuba and expressed the opinion that a considerable part of the tobacco industry did not know of the threatened reduction in duties on their product.

FALLACY OF HEARINGS

During the hearing the chairman of the committee, Hon. Thomas Walker Page, interrupted a witness to state that the function of the committee was simply to receive information and transmit it to the President or to persons he might designate. He emphasized that the committee had no information to give out concerning the possible contents of the proposed agreement. After stating that the purpose of the hearing was not to argue the pros and cons of the tariff but to receive concrete information, he indicated that the committee would make no recommendations based upon the evidence gathered.

The hearings, to my mind, are a farce. They are of no benefit to our domestic producers. In the first place, industries do not know whether they will be affected. If they think they will be affected, they do not know to what extent. Moreover, they have little time to prepare their views after the intention to negotiate an agreement is announced. Worse still, they present their views to one agency, while the actual negotiations are carried on by others, and the agency to which they present their views has no power to act or even to make recommendations. Each time a new agreement is announced the whole process has to be repeated.

Let me ask what good the hearings did the domestic sugar producers, or the domestic tobacco growers, or the domestic fruit and vegetable producers? In spite of the convincing arguments advanced by them in opposition to any reduction in duties, did not the President reduce the rates on their commodities by from 17 to 50 percent?

In effect, the hearings amounted to no more than an invitation to domestic producers to be present at their own funeral. Like the Christians in ancient Rome who were thrown to the lions, they can only say, "We who are about to die salute thee."

I have pointed out that the intention to negotiate the trade agreement with Cuba was announced July 3 and that the oral hearings were held on July 23. I wish only to add that on August 24, less than a month after the hearings closed, the trade agreement had been signed.

Mr. Chairman, that is a new type of legislation, never to my knowledge known before, when a law is passed binding the people of this country, to that of which they have no previous knowledge and to which they have given no consideration whatsoever. This is an agreement between an official of our Government and an official of a foreign government.

I hope that our interests, and particularly the agricultural people of our country, will eventually bring to the Supreme Court of the United States the question for decision as to the constitutionality of that method of enacting legislation to govern the people of our country. It will be a terrible oversight if some of these great industries that have been affected by this agreement do not get the question squarely before the Supreme Court. If they do, I think most of us can prophesy correctly as to the result.

Now, what has happened? I am going to insert some figures in relation to the sugar quota, the tobacco quota, and other quotas set up, but I want particularly to refer to the sugar situation in this detail.

A larger percentage of sugar is now brought to this country from Cuba than has previously been brought here, and under the quota a lesser quantity is allowed to be produced by our own people. I visited a sugar plantation in Florida last year, and I am reliably informed that the people owning that property, developing an isolated, unoccupied section of the district represented by my good friend listening to me now, put money into circulation there by purchasing cane in their anxiety to develop it and hoped to increase their investment to a $25,000,000 plant. They were not allowed to do so under the quota. They could not make another pound of sugar on account of the large quantity of additional sugar coming in from Cuba.

Which is better—to aid the Cuban producers of sugar under the conditions in which the people live down there, or set up a plant in this country whereby we produce the cane or produce the beets and sell the sugar produced and manufactured here in our own country? There are gentlemen in this House much more familiar with that particular detail than I am, and I hope in due time we shall hear the complete story of the unfair treatment that is being accorded sugar producers and other agriculturists under the reciprocal-trade law.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman know that the Federal Government is now spending $27,000,000 on the Casper-Alcova project in Wyoming, which is only suited to the growing of sugar beets?

Mr. TREADWAY. Will they allow them to grow the beets?

Mr. CULKIN. And at the same time cutting down the quota will not permit them to raise the sugar beets.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan, who is familiar with this matter, the amount of reduction of beet sugar under this reciprocal tariff? I am sure the information is available, and I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] to answer the question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In 1933 the production of beet sugar in this country was 1,756,000 tons. Under the reciprocal-trade agreement and the Jones-Costigan Act we are limited to 1,510,000 tons, which is 206,000 tons less than we produced in 1933. This year, 1935, we expect to import into this country from Cuba sugar which represents 283,000,000 hours of labor. In other words, 100 pounds of sugar represents 8 hours of labor. Each bag of sugar imported into this country from other countries represents 8 hours of American labor.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact that under the reciprocal-trade agreement there will be imported into this country 300,000 tons of Cuban sugar that can be raised by the beet-sugar industry of the West or the cane-sugar industry of the South?

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I compare that method of treating our people by the Government with what I happen to know to be the case in Canada?

To my certain knowledge the Canadian Government is at this very moment considering guaranteeing principal and interest on bonds necessary to erect additional beet-sugar mills in order to increase the domestic production of beet sugar nearly 200 percent. Compare this attitude of the Canadian Government toward its industry and agriculture with what this country is doing to its producers under the reciprocal-trade agreement system.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Does not the gentleman know that the policy of Canada, as just outlined by the gentleman from Massachusetts, is also the policy of every country in the world, except the United States, that can in any way produce sugar? The policy laid down by Canada is precisely that of every enlightened country in the world except the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman tell me why this is not the policy of the United States under the present administration?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 additional minutes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman from Massachusetts has asked me if I could explain why the administration and the Congress, at the request of the administration, had reduced the amount of sugar that the American farmer could raise. I wish to say in response to that question that this particular action, and the action now being taken by the administration under the provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act and treaties, is based upon the mistaken theory that by denying the American farmer the right to raise the food the American people eat and by denying the American workingman the right to produce the things in this country the American people need rehabilitation of industry and agriculture can be brought about and prosperity returned to the country, with the reemployment of something like eleven and a half million men now walking the streets looking for jobs, with none to be had.

Mr. TREADWAY. In other words, I infer that the gentleman from Michigan greatly prefers that the sugar used by citizens of the United States be produced from the beets and cane of this country rather than have a reciprocal-trade agreement entered into taking away 300,000 tons of that product now in favor of Cuba?

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thought that was the gentleman's position.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Very briefly.

Mr. HOOK. Has there not been the same practice followed for many years from the Republican administration down through the various administrations to give the same treatment to the copper industry and the iron industry that is now given to the beet industry?

Mr. TREADWAY. There has never been a trade agreement entered into that did not come back to Congress in some form or other for confirmation by the representatives of the people of the United States. That will answer the gentleman, and I now prefer not to be interrupted again along that line, because I know the gentleman's line of argument. He is trying to represent that the Republican Party did what you are trying to do now, and we never did. You can never find a time when the question of the constitutionality of any act of a Republican administration with respect to the tariff has been successfully challenged in the courts, where your actions are being taken today.

Mr. HOOK. What I am asking is this: If the sugar interests are given this protection, which I think they are entitled to, then I am asking that same protection for the copper and the iron industries.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a different subject from the one we are discussing. So far as I know, copper and iron have not entered into the question.

Mr. HOOK. It is the same principle.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman's administration can give it to them if it wants to do so.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; that is a matter for the gentleman's administration.

The question has been brought up as to the quantity of sugar that was being raised, both in this country and in Cuba, and I have some interesting figures here of the tonnage, and I shall elaborate on them in my extension without going into it now.

We imported from Cuba, in 1933, 1,601,000 tons, and we consumed in this country 93 pounds per capita during that same period.

So the use of sugar dropped from 108 pounds to 90 pounds, and at the same time we have consistently increased the quantity of sugar being brought to this country in spite of the lower per capita consumption. I cannot for the life of me see where any sensible man representing the people of this country can approve of that sort of conduct.

Now it is not limited to sugar. The gentleman from New York yesterday explained the situation as regards matches. It seems that there is a great group of capitalists here arranging for a change of the duty on Swedish matches. You do not suppose that they want to raise that duty for the benefit of the American producer. On the contrary, their only object is to make some kind of a deal or trade whereby our industry in producing matches shall be wiped out.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not true that a treaty is being worked out with Denmark whereby we shall take a great quantity of butter from that country?

Mr. TREADWAY. I have some interesting documents here from which I will quote later in the extension of my remarks. I do not see any great enthusiasm on the part of the dairy people of this country for a treaty whereby Denmark shall be brought into competition with the American farmer.

Now, there is another interesting question. These star-chamber methods are considering a treaty with Belgium.

The one great export from Belgium is cement. We are being asked today to make very extended and large appropriations from our Federal Treasury for public works. Of course, cement will be largely used. The biggest article of construction will be cement. Sections of our country manufacture cement. Pennsylvania is greatly interested in the manufacture of cement. But it is proposed to make reciprocal reductions on the duty on cement in order that they may lay down here, in the ports along the American seaboard, Belgian cement to go into the construction of public buildings and public works paid for from our Treasury. Justify that if you can.

I am told that every thousand barrels of cement brought here from a foreign country means the loss of 150 hours of American labor in Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. DITTER. Is it not a fact that the decrease of cement production in this country becomes all the greater as the Belgian cement is used in public works paid for out of the Treasury?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is what I am attempting to bring out—that the representatives of Belgium want to furnish the cement that goes into our public buildings paid for out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact that the use of Belgian glass will cut down the production of our factories here?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; glass will be used also. If Belgium can get their glass and cement here under some favorable tariff condition, the producers here will have to cut their prices to correspond to the imported article.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Just what commodity is it that we are going to export to Belgium that will give employment in this country to take the place of the cement that we are going to import?

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me illustrate that by automobiles. I do not know whether it is automobiles that are going to Belgium or not, but it is a fact that it is stated that more automobiles will be shipped from Michigan to Cuba as a result of this reciprocal trade, through bringing in Cuban sugar, but I state very definitely and positively that one county in Michigan will buy more Michigan-produced automobiles than would be sent to Cuba in exchange for 300,000 tons of Cuban sugar.

Mr. HARLAN. But there has to be equality of value.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; there does not have to be equality of value. It may be all one-sided. We reduce our tariff rates in favor of Cuban products, but Cuba does not have to take a single dollar's worth of goods in return. All she agrees to do is reduce certain of her tariff rates, and whether we ship any goods to Cuba depends on whether we can undersell the rest of the world, even with the reduced tariff.

The Secretary of State is a free-trader of the worst kind, and he is the one who is putting this game across.

Mr. HARLAN. Does the gentleman say that we are going to continue to buy sugar and cement——

Mr. TREADWAY. It looks to me as if the administration wants to favor foreign production over American production. That is the picture. There is no question about that. Some day the American people will wake up to that fact and demand that American production take precedence over foreign importations.

From time to time trade agreements will be concluded with other countries. I have already named those with which negotiations are now being carried on. We may expect to hear soon that our domestic watch producers have been put out of business and their employees thrown out of work by reductions in the duty on Swiss watches. We may reasonably expect to wake up some morning and find that certain branches of the agricultural industry have been crippled by reductions in the duty on butter and cheese from the Netherlands, on wheat from Canada, on meats and hides from Argentina, and so on. We may expect to find our brick and cement industries destroyed by a reduction in the duty on importations of these products from Belgium. There is no end to the possibilities, and the possibilities in most cases will, I am sure, turn out to be probabilities.

I want to say here and now with all the emphasis at my command that I am unalterably opposed to this star-chamber method of procedure in regulating our tariff rates and in dealing with our domestic industries. What right under the sun do representatives of foreign countries have to dictate our tariff rates, or to have a part in fixing them? The Constitution gives to Congress alone the power to fix tariff duties and to regulate commerce with foreign countries. Nothing is said therein about allowing foreign nations to have a hand in the matter.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LAW

This leads me to another point. There also is nothing said in the Constitution about the President's having the power to fix tariff rates and negotiate treaties without the advice and consent of the Senate. When the reciprocal-tariff measure was under consideration in the House, I endeavored to point out that Congress, in giving such broad authority to the President, was doing an unconstitutional act. Only a few days ago the Supreme Court of the United States confirmed my stand when it said that Congress could not delegate legislative authority to the President.

There are two ways in which this country could conduct trade negotiations with foreign countries—namely, through treaties and through valid Executive agreements. Under the Constitution, the President has the power to negotiate treaties, but they must be confirmed by the Senate, and when they affect the revenue the House has always insisted on a concurrent right of ratification.

Executive agreements, on the other hand, are negotiated and concluded exclusively by the President, but only under specific authority of Congress and pursuant to a definite legislative policy laid down in advance in the act authorizing such agreements. The reciprocal agreements conducted under the McKinley tariff of 1890 are an example of this form of negotiation. There Congress put certain named articles on the free list, with a proviso that if any country which exported those articles to the United States imposed unreasonable duties on our products, the President should suspend the free entry of such articles from that country and put into effect certain rates of duty prescribed by Congress in the act. Thus, under this type of arrangement, the President merely carries out the policy previously laid down by Congress. He has no discretion in the matter, either as to putting the rates into effect or as to what they should be. In other words, under a true Executive agreement, the President exercises no legislative authority.

If the trade agreements negotiated by the President under the reciprocal-tariff act are alleged to be Executive agreements—and that is what the act says they are—then they are clearly unconstitutional, and will be so held by the Supreme Court just as soon as a case can be brought before it. Anyone reading the act will see that the President has full discretion as to whether he will negotiate an agreement with any country; that he has full discretion as to the articles to be dealt with in the negotiations; and that he has full discretion in determining the amount of the reduction in rates, subject to the general limitation of 50 percent. This discretion is the test of the legislative power which the President has under the act, and it is this discretion which vitiates the entire set-up.

If the agreements arrived at by the President under the act are not valid as Executive agreements, neither are they valid as treaties, since they are not subject to ratification by the Senate nor to approval by the House of Representatives.

I have introduced a bill—H. R. 3422—to terminate the President's authority to negotiate any further trade agreements. I hope that it will be enacted; but even if passed by a majority of the two branches, it would be necessary to have a two-thirds vote to override a Presidential veto, which probably would be forthcoming.

I am firmly convinced that if this act could be brought before the Supreme Court for review it would be declared invalid, and in that event my bill would be unnecessary. The difficulty with this course, however, is that it would take a long time to bring a case before the Court, and in the meantime much damage could be done to domestic industries. I firmly believe that as additional trade agreements are concluded, and the reductions in duty thereunder put into effect, there will be a loud and increasing demand upon the part of the people of this country that the Trade Agreements Act be repealed. It cannot possibly be of benefit to the country as a whole; and while it might conceivably benefit certain groups, it would hurt many more. Thus it is clearly class legislation.

EXPERIENCE WITH RECIPROCITY

Our past experience with reciprocity is not encouraging, and world conditions today are less favorable for it than they were years ago, since each nation is trying to become self-contained and self-sustained. Our people will soon awaken to the fact that the domestic market is more important than the foreign market, since we consume in this country 90 percent of what we produce. Our farmers realize that if domestic industries must be destroyed to secure a larger market for their wheat and pork, they will be the eventual losers, since the best customer they have is the American workman, who is the highest paid in the world.

If we are going to seek larger foreign markets, we must be prepared to meet world competition, and this means low production costs. Our standard of living would have to be lowered to that of Europe and the Orient, fewer men could be employed, sweatshop working conditions would prevail, and wages would have to be reduced to a fraction of what they now are. Is it worth the price?

Under permission to extend, I desire to submit the following memorandum regarding sugar importations into this country from Cuba:

Sugar imported into this country from Cuba, measured in short tons, raw value—2,000 pounds 96° sugar—amounted in—

| | Tons |
|---|---|
| 1931 | 1,857,022 |
| 1932 | 1,762,000 |
| 1933 | 1,601,000 |
| 1934 | 1,901,752 |

The total consumption of all sugars in the United States for—

| | Pounds Per capita |
|---|---|
| 1929 | 108.13 |
| 1930 | 99.37 |
| 1931 | 98.47 |
| 1932 | 93.29 |
| 1933 | 93.60 |
| 1934 | 90.71 |

Thus it will be seen that during the 6-year period 1929 to 1934, inclusive, our consumption dropped from 108.13 pounds per capita to 90.71 pounds per capita, or a decrease of 16+ percent.

In 1933 the beet-sugar industry of the United States produced in short tons, refined value, approximately 1,725,000 tons of sugar, and, in addition, the production of our island possessions, Puerto Rico and Hawaii (not to mention the Philippines), stepped up their production, all of which was benefiting our own people, citizens under the American flag and for whom we are responsible economically and socially. Cuba still participated in our market to the extent of 1,601,000 tons as set forth above.

The Jones-Costigan Sugar Act, which was approved early in 1934, empowered the Secretary of Agriculture to restrict, through quotas, production of sugar, both beet and cane, on our mainland as well as in Puerto Rico and Hawaii (to say nothing about the Philippines), and under this quota the Secretary allocated to Cuba a participation in our market of 1,901,752 tons, or an increase of 300,752 tons for 1934 over and above Cuba's participation in our market for 1933, and this 300,752 tons of a nonsurplus crop was taken from the sugar spouts of the factories operated by citizens of the United States located in continental United States, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii.

Had our consumption of refined sugar per capita in 1934 been as great as under normal conditions in 1929, we would have consumed about 6,129,000 tons refined value of sugar instead of 5,134,746 tons. This would have called for an increase of 994,254 tons. Under the Jones-Costigan Act, our domestic (continental) producers may have 30 percent of the increase. With a return to normal industrial conditions in this country with the consequent increased consumption of sugar in the form of ice cream, candy, candied fruits, and sweetened preserves, cakes, and pies by our industrial workers engaged in mass production and with our continental producers receiving only 30 percent of the increased consumption, one can fully appreciate what a great service we have rendered to Cuba in the passage of the Jones-Costigan Act and the consummation of the new trade treaty which guarantees to Cuba such a very large percentage of our consumption and, further, which gives Cuba, by reason of the preferential, a monopoly on that portion of our consumption which is not permitted to be produced through the quotas assigned to our people and their factories operating in continental United States, Puerto Rico, Hawaii, Philippines, and Virgin Islands. Cuba enjoys such a high preferential that she can completely dominate the market by reason of her power to pass such export laws as she may deem advisable to the best interests of sugar operators engaged in Cuba.

The following table shows the tariff concessions to Cuba under the provisions of the reciprocal-trade agreement entered into with that country:

Tariff concessions to Cuba under the recent reciprocal-trade agreement

| Commodity | Statutory rate (act of 1930) | Cuban preference under 1903 treaty | New Cuban rate (trade agreement) | Percent reduction |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Glycerin, crude | 1 cent per pound | 0.8 cent per pound | 0.4 cent per pound | 50 |
| Grapefruit oil, distilled or essential | 25 percent | 20 percent | 10 percent | 50 |
| Cement floor and wall tiles: | | | | |

[1] General rate on sugar under Tariff Act of 1930 was 2.5 cents per pound (96°); on Cuban sugar, 2 cents. The rate was reduced by the President under the flexible-tariff provisions on May 9, 1934, effective June 8, 1934.

[2] General rate on eggplant and peppers under act of 1930 was 3 cents per pound; rates reduced by Presidential proclamation under flexible-tariff provisionson Dec. 2, 1931, effective Jan. 1, 1932.

The following is a statement prepared by the National Dairy Union showing the dangerous effect on agriculture of the trade agreement with Cuba. I understand that the views expressed therein also are concurred in by the National Grange.

CUBAN RECIPROCITY TREATY DANGEROUS TO AGRICULTURE

If the Cuban Trade Agreement Treaty just signed is to be the pattern for other trade agreements, then diversified agriculture in the United States is in grave danger. There is a possible benefit in the Cuban treaty for growers of staple crops—cotton, rice, wheat, corn, and potatoes. It penalizes all other crops which farmers have been asked to raise as a relief from the overproduction of the staples. Particularly it penalizes tobacco, sugar, fruits, and vegetables. Dairy products as to which a Cuban market might have been found are entirely ignored in the trade agreement.

All of the Cuban products admitted to the United States under lower tariffs directly compete with domestic products. None of the products admitted to Cuba under lowered tariffs compete with any Cuban product with the single exception of cigarettes.

Cuban interests are benefited and domestic producers penalized by a tariff reduction on sugar to 0.6 of a cent a pound under a quota agreement permitting Cuban shipments of approximately 2,000,000 long tons. What can Cuba buy that will grow on the cane fields and sugar-beet fields which will be left idle by this arrangement? Eighteen percent more tobacco is to be imported from Cuba under this treaty and all tobacco at sharply reduced duties.

The most startling change in tariffs found in this agreement is the "seasonal reduction" of rates on fruits and vegetables produced in Cuba. These Cuban products compete directly with the products of the Gulf Coast States. In general it can be said that the tariff on these competing farm products is reduced during the season from December 1 and spring when the domestic producer needs it most and can profit most by the present tariff. The changes provided for in the new trade agreement are as follows:

| Item | Present rate | New rate | For what period |
|---|---|---|---|
| Lima beans.....per pound.. | $0.028 | $0.014 | Dec. 1 to May 31. |
| White potatoes.....do.... | .60 | .30 | Dec. 1 to end of February. |
| Tomatoes.....do.... | .024 | .018 | Do. |
| Cucumbers.....do.... | .024 | .012 | Do. |
| Egg plant.....do.... | .012 | .006 | Dec. 1 to Mar. 31. |
| Okra.....percent.. | 40 | 20 | Dec. 1 to May 31. |
| Peppers.....per pound.. | .02 | .015 | Jan. 1 to Apr. 30. |
| Squash.....do.... | .016 | .012 | Dec. 1 to May 31. |
| Grapefruit.....do.... | .012 | .006 | Aug. 1 to Sept. 30. |
| Pineapples.....per crate.. | .40 | .20 | At all times. |

These reductions are from 25 percent to 50 percent below previously existing duties. The new rates are likely to permit so large a volume of Cuban winter products in American markets that they will establish a new low price level ruinous to all Gulf States producers.

On the part of Cuba, duties are reduced, as stated, on things Cuba does not produce at all—automobiles, cotton fabrics, wheat flour, pork products, vegetable oils, dried and evaporated fruits, iron, steel, copper, lumber, and paper products. There is also a reduction in the tariff on cigarettes, of which Cuba is a small producer.

Such domestic agricultural benefit as may come will be found in the possible increase in markets for cotton fabrics, wheat and pork products, evaporated fruits, and vegetable oils—the staples as compared with the specialty crops which have been penalized. In other words, this treaty sets one group of American farmers directly opposed in interest to another group of American farmers, a situation which all farmers and their organizations have sought in the past with much success to avoid and overcome.

Cuba has been a great beneficiary from trade with the United States. In 1924, the year of highest trade exchange, Cuba sold the United States $362,265,000 worth of her products, and we sold to Cuba $191,571,000. Cuba was thereby enriched by over $170,000,000 of American money. In that year Cuba's purchases from the United States included $12,000,000 worth of lard and $8,000,000 worth of flour, just a trifle over 10 percent of our total sales to the island. Cotton, wheat, and corn farmers should scrutinize these figures carefully before they accept the statement that this reciprocity business is for the purposes of relieving agricultural surpluses. One hundred and seventy million dollars is too large a bonus to pay to Cuba if only partially at the expense of other farmers to provide a little relief for the wheat and hog producers.

* * * * * * *

Just as the producers of winter fruits and vegetables have been seriously damaged by this treaty, so the producers of meats, hides, dairy products, flaxseed, wool, mohair, feed grains, cottonseed, peanut and soybean oils, citrus fruits, and other fruits and vegetables now stand in imminent danger of the same treatment by this star-chamber proceeding. Agriculture must not be permitted to be divided against itself. They must not permit the interest of one or more commodities to be played up against the interest of other commodities. They must keep informed as to the meaning of this new development which, if carried out along the line of the Cuban Reciprocity Treaty, will ultimately let the products of some other country into the United States to the damage and possible ruin of every agricultural producer. Individuals and small units are powerless to protect their interests against this new secret tariff machine which has been set up.

The situation calls in the first place for forceful action through strong national organizations dealing directly with the present tariff authorities and the administration.

Even more important than this, the situation calls for every citizen who is concerned demanding political representation in Washington that will either repeal the law which permits a foreign agreement of this character or at least amend it so that each step which the administration takes under the law shall be done openly, before the public and under full light of publicity.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3973, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 81)

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

In addressing you on June 8, 1934, I summarized the main objectives of our American program. Among these was, and is, the security of the men, women, and children of the Nation against certain hazards and vicissitudes of life. This purpose is an essential part of our task. In my annual message to you I promised to submit a definite program of action. This I do in the form of a report to me by a Committee on Economic Securities, appointed by me for the purpose of surveying the field and of recommending the basis of legislation.

I am gratified with the work of this committee and of those who have helped it: The Technical Board on Economic Security, drawn from various departments of the Government; the Advisory Council on Economic Security, consisting of informed and public-spirited private citizens and a number of other advisory groups, including a Committee on Actuarial Consultants, a Medical Advisory Board, a Dental Advisory Committee, a Hospital Advisory Committee, a Public Health Advisory Committee, a Child Welfare Committee, and an Advisory Committee on Employment Relief. All of those who participated in this notable task of planning this major legislative proposal are ready and willing, at any time, to consult with and assist in any way the appropriate congressional committees and Members with respect to detailed aspects.

It is my best judgment that this legislation should be brought forward with a minimum of delay. Federal action is necessary to and conditioned upon the actions of States. Forty-four legislatures are meeting or will meet soon. In order that the necessary State action may be taken promptly, it is important that the Federal Government proceed speedily.

The detailed report of the committee sets forth a series of proposals that will appeal to the sound sense of the American people. It has not attempted the impossible, nor has it failed to exercise sound caution and consideration of all of the factors concerned; the national credit, the rights and responsibilities of States, the capacity of industry to assume financial responsibilities, and the fundamental necessity of proceeding in a manner that will merit the enthusiastic support of citizens of all sorts.

It is overwhelmingly important to avoid any danger of permanently discrediting the sound and necessary policy of Federal legislation for economic security by attempting to apply it on too ambitious a scale before actual experience has provided guidance for the permanently safe direction of such efforts. The place of such a fundamental in our future civilization is too precious to be jeopardized now by extravagant action. It is a sound idea—a sound ideal. Most of the other advanced countries of the world have already adopted it, and their experience affords the knowledge that social insurance can be made a sound and workable project.

Three principles should be observed in legislation on this subject. In the first place, the system adopted, except for the money necessary to initiate it, should be self-sustaining in the sense that funds for the payment of insurance benefits should not come from the proceeds of general taxation. Second, excepting in old-age insurance, actual management should be left to the States, subject to standards established by the Federal Government. Third, sound financial management of the funds and the reserves, and protection of the credit structure of the Nation should be assured by retaining Federal control over all funds through trustees in the Treasury of the United States.

At this time, I recommend the following types of legislation looking to economic security:

First. Unemployment compensation.

Second. Old-age benefits, including compulsory and voluntary annuities.

Third. Federal aid to dependent children through grants to States for the support of existing mother's pension systems and for services for the protection and care of homeless, neglected, dependent, and crippled children.

Fourth. Additional Federal aid to State and local public health agencies and the strengthening of the Federal Public Health Service. I am not at this time recommending the adoption of so-called "health insurance", although groups representing the medical profession are cooperating with the Federal Government in the further study of the subject and definite progress is being made.

With respect to unemployment compensation, I have concluded that the most practical proposal is the levy of a uniform Federal pay-roll tax, 90 percent of which should be allowed as an offset to employers contributing under a compulsory State unemployment-compensation act. The purpose of this is to afford a requirement of a reasonably uniform character for all States cooperating with the Federal Government and to promote and encourage the passage of unemployment-compensation laws in the States. The 10 percent not thus offset should be used to cover the costs of Federal and State administration of this broad system. Thus States will largely administer unemployment compensation, assisted and guided by the Federal Government. An unemployment-comparison system should be constructed in such a way as to afford every practicable aid and incentive toward the larger purpose of employment stabilization. This can be helped by the intelligent planning of both public and private employment. It also can be helped by correlating the system with public employment so that a person who has exhausted his benefits may be eligible for some form of public work, as is recommended in this report. Moreover, in order to encourage the stabilization of private employment Federal legislation should not foreclose the States from establishing means for inducing industries to afford an even greater stabilization of employment.

In the important field of security for our old people it seems necessary to adopt three principles: First, noncontributory old-age pensions for those who are now too old to build up their own insurance; it is, of course, clear that for perhaps 30 years to come funds will have to be provided by the States and the Federal Government to meet these pensions. Second, compulsory contributory annuities, which in time will establish a self-supporting system for those now young and for future generations. Third, voluntary contributory annuities, by which individual initiative can increase the annual amounts received in old age. It is proposed that the Federal Government assume one-half of the cost of the old-age pension plan, which ought ultimately to be supplanted by self-supporting annuity plans.

The amount necessary at this time for the initiation of unemployment compensation, old-age security, children's aid, and the promotion of public health, as outlined in the report of the Committee on Economic Security, is approximately $100,000,000.

The establishment of sound means toward a greater future economic security of the American people is dictated by a prudent consideration of the hazards involved in our national life. No one can guarantee this country against the dangers of future depressions, but we can reduce these dangers. We can eliminate many of the factors that cause economic depressions, and we can provide the means of mitigating their results. This plan for economic security is at once a measure of prevention and a method of alleviation.

We pay now for the dreadful consequence of economic insecurity, and dearly. This plan presents a more equitable and infinitely less expensive means of meeting these costs. We cannot afford to neglect the plain duty before us. I strongly recommend action to attain the objectives sought in this report.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 17, 1935.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the message and the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered printed, and, on that, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 3973, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the large amount of misinformation which has been contained in letters and statements in the newspapers with reference to the so-called "Townsend plan" of old-age pensions, I feel that I should make a public statement of my position with reference to this matter.

In the first place, let it be considered that this is far more than is required to maintain our old people in reasonable comfort. In the second place, the requirements of our people to be maintained in reasonable comfort are so far different in the South than in the North that where many of our old people who require such a thing as an old-age pension in the South where the climate is mild and warm, food and clothing requirements are less, and housing requirements much less, an aged man and his family will get along in luxury on $15 a month, where an old man and his family in the northern part of the country in the city with city rents to pay would starve to death. Therefore, to my mind the only proper way to handle the old-age pension situation is through a State law where the State legislatures will know the requirements of their people. If there has to be temporary Federal aid to meet this on account of the present economic stress and inability of the States to borrow to meet their requirements, this should be done. We should avoid, however, as far as possible, discouraging thrift and discouraging the desirability of our people saving enough in their active years to take care of their old age.

With reference to the Townsend plan in particular, it calls for the payment of approximately $2,000,000,000 a month or $24,000,000,000 a year. This means a 60 to 65 percent sales tax on all ultimate sales to consumers in the United States. Perhaps it runs as high as 70 percent. If the tax should be imposed upon each transaction from the original producer to the ultimate consumer, it would pyramid your sales tax so it would run from 75 to 80 percent. Such a sales tax would absolutely destroy all trade and commerce and cause such great distress amongst the young and old as to practically ruin them. In addition to that, it would cause uncontrolled inflation, and the result would be even more disastrous than the spending program of the present administration because it would be three or four times as large.

I am in the minority in Congress, but I feel that it is my duty as a Member of that minority to vote for those things that I believe right and against those things that I know to be wrong, regardless of whether they are sponsored by the administration or by those opposed to it.

Believing that the Townsend plan in execution would result in a total collapse of the financial structure of the Government very rapidly, I can do nothing but oppose it.

The people have had the situation with reference to it misrepresented to them, and I feel it my duty to tell them the truth about it regardless of its political effect. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, on June 5, 1933, Congress passed the act "to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States." By this act we outlawed and declared void the provision in all contracts requiring payment in gold.

The constitutionality of that act has been assailed, and it is now under consideration by the Supreme Court. I rise to discuss what might be the consequences if the Court should decide that the act was beyond the power of Congress and, therefore, void. I make no comment and express no opinion as to what the decision should be nor what it may be. That is a matter which the Court under its responsibility will pass upon, according to the lights before it.

Also, I preface what I shall say by saying that it has no political aspect whatever; in the remotest degree it has no bearing upon partisanship. Particularly it must not be construed as a criticism of the administration or of anything that the administration has done, nor is it intended as a defense of the administration or of anything that the administration has done. It is designed merely as my slight contribution to an analysis of the situation and toward stability, reassurance, and confidence in the business and industrial world.

In the course of the argument on the constitutionality of this act before the Supreme Court an eminent gentleman, high in the councils of the Government, took occasion to predict that if the Court should hold the act to be unconstitutional the result would be "chaos." That cue has been taken in numerous circles. The press has spread it throughout the country. I have read articles which stated as a matter of fact that those who owed gold obligations would find themselves obliged to pay $1.69, I believe it was, for every dollar in the face of the obligation.

In my judgment the general impression grossly overestimates the effect of such a decision by the Supreme Court. It seems to me that its probable effect is exaggerated by the unthinking, so that it behooves all of us to analyze the situation, to decide what is involved, and to endeavor not to frighten the people of this country beyond what may be justified.

Let us bear in mind that on June 5, when this act was passed, all gold had been withdrawn from circulation and the possession of gold, either for payment of an obligation or in receipt of such payment, had become a crime. It was impossible, therefore, at that time not only for anyone to pay in gold, but unlawful for anyone to receive gold. If this act is stricken down as void, it will leave that identical legal situation. There will remain nobody who has any gold, nobody who can accept any gold, nobody who, if his demand for gold is complied with, can receive it without laying himself open to liability to be sent to the penitentiary.

It should also be borne in mind that an adverse decision cannot have the slightest effect upon obligations not payable in gold, and also that it cannot have the slightest direct effect upon price indexes. The act striking down the gold clause in obligations neither raised nor did it lower prices. It did not in any direct way affect price indexes. If it had any effect whatsoever on prices, it was a purely psychological and indirect effect. I do not believe that any economist, either by the facts of the situation or upon the basis of theory, can prove that it did have the slightest effect upon prices. Therefore, I think we are safe in saying that if the Supreme Court declares that act unconstitutional, that decision will not have the slightest direct effect either to raise or lower prices. That it will have a psychological effect, particularly in speculative fields, I do not doubt.

Nobody knows with any degree of accuracy how many obligations payable in gold there are outstanding. I have heard an estimate of $100,000,000,000. It may be more; it may be less. There are something like $30,000,000,000 of those obligations that are public obligations. The remainder of the total of something like $250,000,000,000 of outstanding debts in the United States is payable in any legal tender, and the decision will not affect them.

Let me say this: That as the passage of the act had an effect on two fronts, so will the striking down of the act have an effect on two fronts. Those fronts are the psychological front, on men's minds; and the actual or direct front, the effect which the decision may have upon prices, upon debts, and upon other real things, an effect that is not due to a state of mind or to man's emotions but of actualities and economic laws.

When we passed the act making void the gold clause in obligations, there was an enormous psychological reaction. That effect was not confined to this country. It extended to the remotest corners of the world. We did not pass the act because the Government of the United States was unable to meet its obligations in gold. We did not pass it because of governmental poverty or need. We passed this act for the purpose of relieving debtors who had given obligations payable in gold. Its sole purpose was to transfer a benefit from what the agitators call the "creditor class" to what those same gentlemen with equal inaccuracy and with equal lack of knowledge of what they are saying or what they mean call the "debtor class"—for, of course, there is neither of such classes. We are all debtors and we are all creditors, and those who have the biggest assets are, generally speaking, the biggest debtors.

We passed this act. We struck down the promise of the United States Government and of the governments of all our States and cities and of many corporations and people to pay their obligations in a certain fashion and in certain terms. I have no desire to discuss the propriety of that action. I do say that its consequences were to strike a blow at the confidence of mankind such as this world has rarely felt before. We had prided ourselves upon our record of keeping our solemnly pledged word. We had said that the pledged word of the United States was its obligation and will be kept and honored at all times and everywhere. We had said that when we engaged with our sister nations, we would comply with our treaty obligations to the remotest detail.

When we passed that act, we said, "We repudiate the obligation that we gave. We will not do what we said we would do." The gold clause in our national bonds took its place with a "scrap of paper" and all the broken treaties and violated promises of the past. Our action not only shook the confidence of the world and contributed to the mistrust and distrust among nations and to the lack of international good will—it not only made that contribution—but it had an effect upon our own people, a very immediate and overwhelming effect upon the psychology of our own people. Obligations were no longer regarded as obligations had previously been. It shook the morale of our people. Men recognized that the repudiation of a part of an obligation differs only in degree and not in kind from the repudiation of the whole obligation. Men recognized that those who had repudiated one clause in their contracts had committed an offense against ethics, good morals, and good faith, differing only in degree from those who might say, "I owe you an honest debt, but I won't pay you a red penny."

That consequence extended throughout our whole country. It touched and affected—alas, I fear, permanently—the lives of all our people. That is done. I cannot recall it. I have no desire to recall it. Still less do I desire to criticize it. I merely state the facts, not my opinions.

Of all outstanding obligations, probably the most important are those carried in the insurance policies as they are held by nearly all of our people throughout the entire country. Those insurance policies aggregate something like $112,000,000,000. Their withdrawal value is about $16,000,- 000,000. That much is owing by the insurance companies to the women and children, a vast majority of whom have but little means and but little hope. That is the rock upon which they have built for sustenance when the breadwinner of the family had passed into the Great Beyond. The assets of the insurance companies are composed in the main of obligations carrying the gold clause. The striking down of the act of June 5 will very materially strengthen their position. It will make an insurance policy worth more than it was before. It will add to the assurance and confidence of every man in this whole country who has taken insurance for the protection of his wife and his children when he is gone.

The public obligations payable in gold amount to something like twenty-five to thirty-five billion dollars. It is very hard for me to guess at that because of the great change that has gone on through the refinancing of the Federal debt and various other things that have been done within the last year or so. Those who hold those obligations will be benefited. Their position will be made more secure, and at the same time the situation of the States, counties, and municipalities, which owe something like $20,000,000,000 of these obligations, will be no worse than it was before. They owe those debts. Their means of income is through the collection of taxes. Their revenues are not payable in gold, but their obligations are so payable in gold. Taxes will be paid just as before. There is a chance that the cost of government will be less. It is certain that the credit of these public units will be enhanced by a decision holding as valid the gold clause in their obligations. They will perhaps be able to borrow money at a lower rate of interest than before. So that if this act is unconstitutional, the probabilities are that the situation of our States, counties, and cities will be no worse than it is at present. It may even be improved.

So far as railroad and industrial securities are concerned, undoubtedly striking down the act will have a harmful effect upon equities of all kinds. It will depreciate the value of common and preferred stocks. It will enhance the value of their obligations which are payable in gold.

In the speculative field, the effect of striking down this act may be very considerable. It may cause a very great shock, because those fields are very largely controlled by psychology.

Actually, and in reality, each of these classes of railroad and industrial securities very largely offsets the other, and there should be no important reaction in Wall Street if only realities could be counted upon, and psychology, fear, and speculation could be eliminated. But let me say in passing that I am not awfully much interested in what goes on in Wall Street, nor am I greatly concerned that some man has bought an equity on such and such terms, that he may be forced to sell it for less than he has paid for it. It will not take away one hair's weight from the real worth of his security. This assurance I should like to give him.

So far as banks are concerned, they are probably not making many loans on these equities. If they are, they will be affected. At any rate, I say to them that it is the easiest thing in the world to overestimate and magnify the evil consequences which might come out of this decision of the Supreme Court.

I think the business men of this country should get this in their minds. I invite them to analyze the situation and to think it out. Do not take some newspaper economist's word for it, or a statement made by someone who in the enthusiasm of legal argument dragged in something extraneous to the case. Let these men of business think for themselves. Let them figure out for themselves how it will hurt them. I assure them if they keep their feet on the ground, if my economic judgment is of any value, there will be very slight harm to the business of this country.

Of course, a decision that the act is void will work two ways. I can see benefits to come out of it. I can see wherein any ill effect might be balanced off by very material good. A moment ago I pointed out that our action in repudiating our obligation had a world-wide impact. No man who understands world affairs can doubt for a minute that this is true. This depression is not local, it is not national; it is world-wide. The world is paying for the war. The world saw fit to unleash all the hates of mankind and to send millions of the finest of all races into the trenches, with deadly instruments of death in their hands, set upon taking each other's lives. The world took out of useful occupations, out of the production of things needful for man, things which might have contributed to his welfare and happiness—the world took out of those occupations millions upon millions of the strongest, and bravest, and best, and set them instead to bringing about destruction—to destruction of the fruits of man's labor, to subtracting from the sum total of the wealth of mankind. They were set not merely to taking each other's lives but to destroying both the material and the immaterial wealth of all the nations. They blocked the channels of commerce, they pulled all the nations out of plumb and out of equilibrium, and now we are reaping the consequences.

The fundamental cause of this depression was the war. It roots back into the war, and it has its manifestations in the erection of barriers of trade between the nations, and in the damming up of the channels of commerce throughout the world. It has had its effect in destroying mutual confidence and good will. The most serious factor confronting us now is the lack of confidence of nations, each in the other. They no longer trust each other; they no longer regard the pledged word to each other; they no longer feel that they can rely upon the promise given, even by the proudest of the nations.

There can be no recovery in America until there has been recovery in some measure in all the world. The key to recovery in this country is to open up the markets of the world to the fruits of the labor of our people; to tear down international trade barriers and also to destroy the multitude of trade barriers which have been erected between our own people and which prevent freedom of commerce between our own people. This is the real cure.

It will be years before the nations will trust each other again; it will be years before there is peace in Germany, in France, in China, and so on, and on, and on; but our contribution—the greatest contribution we in America can make is to see to it that America's promises shall always be inviolate. [Applause.]

If the nations of the world should be able to point to America and to a decision of our great Supreme Court, our bulwark of liberty and order and honest and brave thinking, which decision shall hold that the American Constitution does not permit that a solemn obligation of our Government shall be repudiated, then we will have made a contribution to world peace and to world stability second to none in the annals of government.

It is a long and a troubled road that we must follow back to happiness and to prosperity. They can be gained by no empirical methods, by no temporary thwarting of economic laws. God made these laws, and man cannot repeal them. When he stands in their way, it merely means that he may delay, but that eventually he will be crushed. The free flow of commerce throughout the world, based upon confidence and good will among the nations, is fundamental to world peace and to world prosperity. It cannot be gained by ourselves for ourselves alone. The first essential in gaining it is a regard for the sanctity of the obligations of a contract. Upon this principle, Mr. Chairman, I dare to stand. [Applause.]

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in my respect and admiration for the sincerity, the honesty, and the brilliancy of the gentleman from Alabama. However, I do not agree with him in some of the statements he has made. The distinguished gentleman says that the Gold Revaluation Act constituted a repudiation of solemn obligations by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I did not interrupt the gentleman when he was speaking.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman is referring to the wrong act. I did not refer to that act at all.

Mr. DIES. Well, I refer to the statement the gentleman made about going off the gold standard.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; I did not refer to that act.

Mr. DIES. To what act did the gentleman refer?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I referred to the act which declared invalid the gold clause in contracts, that is all.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman stated that that act was passed without any necessity on the part of the Federal Government and that at the time it was passed there was not any apparent necessity for the Government to do it. Now, what are the facts?

The facts are that England had gone off the gold standard, set up a stabilization fund, and was operating in the markets of the world by cheapening its own currency below the currency of the United States in order that England might have an advantage in the world markets. The facts are that France several years before had reduced the content of their franc to one-fifth of its original weight and fineness in order to obtain an advantage in the markets of the world. As a result of the stabilization fund in England and its skillful operation, England was capturing from the United States the markets of the world. Not only was that true, but we have the $100,000,000,000 of obligations in the United States payable in gold when there were only approximately $12,000,000,000 of gold in the entire world.

We were driven to that act not because we deliberately wanted to do so but in order to protect the United States and our export trade from the deliberate and systematic plan of Great Britain to cheapen her currency so that in the markets of the world she would have an advantage.

In regard to the effect of the Supreme Court decision, the gentleman is correct when he says that even if the Supreme Court rules against the Government, the obligations cannot be discharged in gold. It is self-evident that with only $8,000,000,000 of gold in the United States we cannot discharge $100,000,000,000 of obligations with gold. As the gentleman correctly stated, our gold is now in the possession of the Federal Government, and, of course, the Government is not going to surrender the gold. The point the gentleman overlooks, if he will permit me to suggest it, is that in case, under the Supreme Court decision, it becomes necessary for the debtors to discharge obligations payable in gold in the currency equivalent of gold, the man who owes a thousand dollars payable in gold, not being able to deliver a thousand dollars in gold, must deliver the currency equivalent of gold, which would be $35 for each ounce of gold owing under the contract. The consequence of that will be that the debtor classes in the United States will have to discharge their obligations with $35 for every ounce of gold called for in the contract, whereas prior to revaluation they could have discharged the same obligations with $20 for each ounce of gold.

What is the alternative? Of course, we ought to respect the ruling of the Supreme Court of our land, because none of us want to destroy that fundamental branch of our Government; but in case the ruling is adverse, the Government can go back to the old content of 23 and some odd grains for each dollar. The restoration of the old content will be necessary unless some other alternative is found, and this is the reason that gold revaluation is inseparably interwoven with the question of obligations payable in gold. What will be the effect of that? Our export trade will rapidly diminish, because other countries have adjusted their currency on the basis of our $35-an-ounce currency; and if we go back, it will mean that foreign buyers, in order to purchase our exportable surpluses, will only get 20 American dollars for each ounce of gold. Since they will be able to acquire considerably more paper currency of other nations with an ounce of gold, it will be to their interest to purchase the products of those nations. It must naturally follow that the United States will suffer the loss of this world trade.

The gentleman stated that the Revaluation Act did not affect the internal price levels. To some extent the gentleman is correct. One reason for this was our failure to make effective the revaluation by putting into circulation new currency based upon the increased valuation of our gold stock.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I did not say the Devaluation Act had that effect. I said this act of June 5 did not; it is an entirely different act from the Revaluation Act.

Mr. DIES. They are all linked together. To revalue the gold dollar it was necessary to suspend specie redemption and reform and modify gold clauses in contracts to make them payable in lawful currency. To make effective such modification it was necessary to revalue the dollar.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; they are not.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman said that it had no effect on commodity prices in the United States.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I said that this act of June 5 did not.

Mr. DIES. All right, this act. But the gentleman cannot consider these acts separately. Each is a necessary and integral part of a coordinated monetary policy to protect us from cheap currencies abroad and to protect our own people from an abnormally appreciated dollar. The combined acts were designed to restore the normal purchasing power of the dollar so that obligations can be discharged in honest money.

The facts are that the reduction in the contents of the gold dollar enabled foreign buyers to exchange 1 gold ounce for $35 instead of $20. As a consequence of this our export trade was stimulated. Our export trade to China increased some 80 percent, to Ecuador 101 percent, to Japan 50 percent, and to Great Britain 37 percent. Not only did it result in stimulating our export trade by making it possible for foreign buyers to purchase our products on a competitive basis with the products of countries like France and England, who had cheapened and depreciated their currency but more important, it enabled us to hold our remaining export trade. Had it not been for that monetary policy, our export trade would have disappeared. It was manifestly impossible for the United States to maintain a gold standard and redeem these obligations in gold when the world is against us, when other nations go off the gold standard and, as the gentleman says, refuse to redeem their obligations in gold or to cooperate with us in the maintenance of a gold standard.

Now, is it a repudiation of a solemn obligation? One who has an obligation today payable in gold gets currency that has almost as much purchasing power as it did a year ago. Is he being defrauded in any sense if he has an obligation payable in gold for $1,000 and instead of getting $1,000 in gold, he gets $1,000 in American currency? Wherein has he been robbed or defrauded? When you take your $1,000 you can still purchase almost as much of commodities as you could prior to the action of the United States Congress.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. If this $1,000 were lent 5 years ago, you could purchase more commodities today than you could then.

Mr. DIES. That is true, because of the fact that when most of this money was loaned—and the gentleman, who is so much concerned about the fact that we might repudiate some obligation, overlooks this fact—the dollar had a purchasing power 50-percent less than now. Between 1921 and 1929, about $200,000,000,000 were contracted when the dollar was cheap. The dollar had been deliberately made cheap by credit inflation. So the creditor loaned a cheap 50-cent dollar in terms of commodity prices. Then, today, regardless of whether he can be paid in gold or in gold equivalent, he gets back for each dollar he loaned, in terms of purchasing power, twice as much as he actually loaned.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The elements in the United States that are complaining most about this reduction of the gold content of the dollar and the law to which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] referred are the ones, as a rule, who have their money invested in tax-exempt securities or those who have contracts that, as he states, are payable in gold. Suppose the United States Government had discovered an unlimited supply of gold and gold had become cheap. Then those same interests and individuals would have been demanding American dollars instead of gold.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman's point is well taken.

But let me say this, in reference to the repudiation of a promise to pay in gold. In the first place, impossibility of performance is a defense to any contract, and at the time we suspended specie redemption, raids were being made upon our gold stock. We witnessed the ridiculous situation of debtor nations raiding the gold supply of the creditor nation. We could not have redeemed our currency and obligations with gold because there was not enough gold in the world to do this. We could not maintain a gold-exchange currency because other nations refused to cooperate, and in fact forced us to follow their example in self-protection. On account of the deliberate action of other commercial nations in depreciating their currencies we were losing the markets of the world.

Not only is this true, but why was it right to write into a contract that it should be payable in gold and not in the currency of our land? Because the Supreme Court, after the war between the States—I believe in the Gresham case—held that contracts payable in gold were enforceable in gold. The highest court in England has held on the same proposition that a contract payable in gold cannot be enforced, for to do so is to deprive the sovereign power of its control over currency.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power to coin money and to regulate the value of it, and if individuals, by contract, can specify that the payments must be made in gold and not in currency, then that is paramount to saying that individuals have the right to restrict and limit the jurisdiction of Congress over currency and the value of it. If the Supreme Court rules contrary to the contention of the Government and holds that contracts payable in gold must be paid in gold or in the currency equivalent of gold, it means an increase in debt of $69,000,000,000 if we do not go back to the old content of the dollar or adopt some other alternative. Not only that, but it means that we cannot compete on the world markets. How can we sell our products with American dollars dear and the English pound cheap? How can we compete with France with the franc depreciated to one-fifth of what it was before the war? How can we retain the export market that the gentleman says we must have for our economic independence unless we protect our own citizenship against the deliberate "monetary tinkering" of Europe?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I have never been worried very much about the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in this matter for one reason. The American people can go astray about a matter and they will run around in the wilderness, but after a while come out straight; and when the Court approaches this problem, it will probably approach it from the proposition that if the Congress delegated its authority to coin money and regulate the value of it to the President, this was without the bounds.

Mr. DIES. That is true.

Mr. MAY. If they do not find that and get down to the major problem of whether or not the devaluation of the dollar constitutes the impairment of the obligation of a contract to pay in gold, they will probably take the position that the making of these private contracts or these public contracts was done by the people who made them with full knowledge of the constitutional provision that provides that Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate its value.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DIES. I simply want to say in reply to the gentleman that there is no use for us to deceive ourselves about this. If the Supreme Court rules against the Government, we cannot redeem in gold equivalent. Congress should not compel the debtor classes to do it on account of the condition of this country. I will tell you what may have to be done. If we have no other way around it, legally, we can tax the written contracts payable in gold to the extent of 50 percent; and not only this we can issue United States notes to pay the difference between the $20 and the $35. The gentleman would deplore that action on the part of the Congress of the United States, and therefore I say to the gentleman that the creditor classes are more interested, or as vitally interested, in having the acts of the Government upheld as the debtor classes, for if they demand the pound of flesh when people are unable to deliver it, then the Congress of the United States, in protection of the people, will be compelled to resort to some method, either the issuance of United States notes and the taxing of such contracts, in order to save the economic stability of the United States. If we have to restore the old content of the dollar, we can accept silver at a premium in settlement of trade balance and protect our people from cheap foreign currencies. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield 2 minutes, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that one thing that we are suffering from in the House as well as elsewhere is lack of information. [Laughter.]

At the special session of Congress beginning March 4, 1933, we passed several acts which had relation to the use of gold as money. Among these are the act of March 9, 1933, with resolution of ratification passed a few days later, which had effect to withdraw all gold from circulation; the act of May 12, 1933, which authorized the President to devalue the gold dollar by reducing the gold content as much as 50 percent; and the act of June 5, 1933, which declared void all clauses in contracts requiring payment in gold. The latter act I discussed a few minutes ago. It had nothing whatever to do with removing gold from circulation nor with the devaluation of the gold dollar.

My remarks were addressed to the act of June 5, 1933, and the Supreme Court is considering this act only. What I said has not the slightest bearing on the devaluation of gold or upon foreign trade, or upon anything else the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] has talked about.

What I ask is that our business men—I believe them capable of thought—inform themselves and analyze what is in the act, and what the issue before the Court is, and try to do a little thinking of what will be the consequences if the decision should be adverse to the act.

All talk about foreign trade and so on has nothing to do with the subject. I invite thought on what I have said, to wit, that the effects of a decision of the Supreme Court adverse to the act of June 5 may be very minor, and it might be beneficial to the whole world. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania use for any more time?

Mr. DITTER. I have requests over here for approximately an hour, but I cannot use it immediately.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I wish I were capable of discussing the question of the repeal of the gold clause that has just been before the Committee. From my viewpoint, without repeal, the debts could never be paid. The contracts for gold could never be carried out, and we were justified in what we did in abrogating the gold clause.

My object in asking for time was to reply to my friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in his eloquent and brilliant speech on the reciprocal-tariff act.

The Congress was justified in passing that act, and I think his fears are groundless.

He pictured the present condition of agriculture quite accurately and then drew a dark picture of our future under operation of the act. He evidently believes in intense nationalism. He would build a wall around this country and say to every foreign nation: "You cannot send anything in here that we can possibly produce." He would say to Japan, England, France, and to all the nations of the world: "Take back from our harbors your cargoes of silk, of tin, rubber, tea, and coffee, because we are today a self-contained nation." I know that notion is extant in our country. It seems to me that nationalism is one of the things we should fear today. The feeling has been growing in this world for a century and a half. Perhaps it has grown more rapidly in the last century than ever before; and if it keeps on, it will keep raising these tariff walls between nations until trade, commerce, and traffic disappear. That is not going to lead to world peace, but to a world of dissention, trouble, and ultimately to war.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] talks much about industrial alcohol made from blackstrap. I call his attention to the fact that his party was for 10 years in complete control, from 1920 to 1930, of all the branches of this Government. Twice they revised the tariff upward; and if there were such wrongs being committed by not prohibiting the importation of blackstrap, why was its importation not prohibited? He speaks eloquently for the distillers of Peoria and that group which would like to prevent the coming in of those articles which enter largely into the making of industrial alcohol. For that reason he would then condemn the entire reciprocal-tariff law. I would go over the party line, if the picture is half as black as he paints it, and raise the tariff walls to keep out those articles that are evidently cutting off the supplies that should come from corn. Industrial alcohol should be made from our own products if possible. For fear of the importation of blackstrap molasses and starch, would he prevent the entire operation of the reciprocal-tariff act?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman in favor of letting Russian lumber in under one of these reciprocal-tariff arrangements without a tariff? I have in mind shingles and the products of the forest, articles of commerce from his own State.

Mr. PIERCE. I cannot believe for a minute that all of the virtue, all of the attempt to do something for the farming world rests on the Republican side of the Chamber. I am willing to trust the President and his advisers.

Mr. CULKIN. If the gentleman will permit, I am wondering whether he is as academic on lumber as he is on other phases of this tariff question.

Mr. PIERCE. I do not know that I fully understand the gentleman.

Mr. CULKIN. Would the gentleman be in favor of a trade arrangement with Russia permitting lumber to come in under a tariff treaty, without any duty, in competition with the products of his own State?

Mr. PIERCE. No; my State is a heavy producer of lumber.

Mr. CULKIN. So the gentleman would not be in favor of that?

Mr. PIERCE. I would not want to throw down the bars to let lumber in free if it competed with our lumber. I am not a free-trader. Free trade is as much an iridescent dream as is nationalism. We have got to accept some of the world's trade, or we have to regiment beyond any dream that anybody has ever had in this country. If you go to intense nationalism, that means the tying up of the few ships that are sailing the seas today, and that means that trade is gone and that we have to live within ourselves. What are we going to do with our vast surplus, if we cannot sell it or trade it for other goods? The only object of the reciprocal-tariff act was to try to find some place where we could dispose of this surplus. To illustrate from my own section, we have had to export two-thirds of all of the wheat we raise in the Pacific Northwest.

For 50 years that wheat went around the Horn in sailing vessels and then through the Panama Canal into northwestern Europe, where it found a ready market. There is no market for that wheat today. Under intense nationalism what will we do with the wheat? Have we got to quit raising it? What are we going to do with our surplus cotton if we cannot sell or trade some of it abroad?

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. PIERCE. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman speaks as if America were the chief offender in respect to nationalism. Is it not true that European nations first became rampantly national?

Mr. PIERCE. That is probably true.

Mr. CULKIN. And since the World War, they have become more and more national.

Mr. PIERCE. That is probably true.

Mr. CULKIN. And we have, in fact, suffered from a weak nationalism.

Mr. PIERCE. The only way that we can break it down at all is to give to the Executive, who can act quickly, the power to say to a nation like Brazil—we want your coffee, and we will take your coffee if you will take so much wheat or other products. I will go further than the present reciprocal-tariff act, and bargain with those articles that are on the free list. I would say to Japan, "You want to sell your silk, but in order to do so you must take so much of our products."

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman knows that coffee is on the free list.

Mr. PIERCE. I am aware of that, but we have to sell to the outside world.

Mr. CULKIN. So that Brazil would have nothing to bargain for in that connection.

Mr. PIERCE. Brazil can use certain articles of our agricultural products, the same as Cuba will under the reciprocal tariff agreement.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has match factories in his district?

Mr. PIERCE. No.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman realizes that lumber goes into the manufacture of matches?

Mr. PIERCE. I realize that, in some small part.

Mr. CULKIN. A great deal of it comes from the northwest coast, from the gentleman's own State, and there is pending now a treaty with Sweden, if the gentleman is familiar with it, whereby the American match industry is to be practically wiped out.

Mr. PIERCE. I cannot believe that. I do not think the President or his advisers would go that far. I think they want to do right and find a market for the surplus, just as much as the gentlemen on this floor.

Mr. CULKIN. That is what the match industry thinks, and that is what the Tariff Commission found in March 1934. Now it is proposed to cut down the tariff on matches and to give them an import quota which will destroy the American industry. Does the gentleman favor that?

Mr. PIERCE. I cannot believe that that is true.

Mr. CULKIN. Assuming it is true, is the gentleman in favor of that?

Mr. PIERCE. It was not true in regard to Cuba, and we heard the same things before that agreement was made.

Mr. CULKIN. Assuming my statement is true, is the gentleman in favor of that?

Mr. PIERCE. No. I cannot believe the President would enter into such a trade agreement. The reciprocal-tariff act, for which I voted, was enacted for the sole purpose of trying to dispose of our surpluses in this country to nations which could take them, giving us certain things in exchange.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman knows what Will Rogers says about our diplomacy—that if we have another naval treaty, all we will come away with is one rowboat.

Mr. PIERCE. I cannot believe that we can live within ourselves and be self-contained and keep our civilization. I think that the darkest day which can come to America will be the day we cut off all trade relations with the world. We cannot say to foreign nations today, "You take our surplus and pay us in gold." They have not the gold. They cannot buy. If we do not buy, we cannot sell.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, does the gentleman not take into consideration the distinction in the standards of living between our people and the Japanese, for instance?

Mr. PIERCE. Certainly.

Mr. CULKIN. For example, we cannot compete with them in the match-making industry, where they pay women 8 cents a day and men 17 cents a day, while we are paying our women 35 cents an hour and our men 50 cents an hour. We cannot compete with them in that field and maintain our standards of living, can we?

Mr. PIERCE. I cannot understand that there will be any attempt, when the final reports come in and the final treaties are made, to break down our business in those lines or break down our standards of living. Our President and his advisers want that to remain just as high as does the gentleman on this side of the aisle. There is no attempt on the part of the President or those around him to turn over our markets to the foreigners who have cheap standards of living; but the object of the reciprocal tariff was simply to reduce these big surpluses which break our home markets. The situation of the farmer is much better today than it was a year ago. The Agricultural Adjustment Act is working for the benefit of the farmer. It is far from being right today, but it is certainly better than it was.

Mr. CULKIN. Someone to my left suggests that I query the gentleman again, if I may, as to what he thinks about something that has already been referred to today, and that is the reduction in beet-sugar production in America. Beet sugar, of course, is not one of our surplus commodities. We only produce about one-quarter of the sugar which we consume. I assume the gentleman's own State raises some sugar beets.

Mr. PIERCE. We do not now produce any sugar beets.

Mr. CULKIN. Some of the abutting States do, however. Under the present arrangement with Cuba the production of beet sugar in continental America, and all sugar, is curtailed, I understand, to about one-third, if I have the facts correctly. That is a nonsurplus crop to which agriculture might turn itself. Does the gentleman think that we should restrict our own farmers?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] has expired.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rose somewhat belatedly to ask the gentleman a question regarding his expression that we had $100,000,000,000 of contracts payable in gold and had but $8,000,000,000 in the country. Some of us who are struggling to learn from these speakers what the cure-all is cannot help thinking that that has been the situation for many years back. For years there has been from fifty to one hundred billion dollars of such contracts while we had perhaps only four billion in the Treasury. But what troubles us is that many of these same legislators who tell of this great danger likewise say that inasmuch as there is $8,000,000,000 in the Treasury, it is now safe to issue 10 times that amount in printed money backed by this gold, because a reserve in the ratio of 1 to 10 would be sufficient in the light of past experience.

These two viewpoints do not seem to click, and I should like to suggest that these obligations of eighty to one hundred billion dollars are generally long-term securities which would not be redeemable for years to come and hence the gold would not be required at any particular date. If we should issue that amount of money, its redemption might be demanded during a short period of panic. There are always runs on banks which have to be temporarily closed because they cannot meet their outstanding obligations. It might be necessary even for the Treasury to stop the payment of gold for a time. But these two absolutely conflicting statements made by the students of monetary problems are rather confusing to us who are trying to learn. It is difficult to follow their lines of reasoning. I wanted a little explanation as to why we seemed to get along pretty well for so long a time, knowing that the same conditions existed. Has all this present chaos resulted from certain foreign nations going off the gold standard? Have not some of them gone off that standard at previous times?

Because of our present difficulties, must we embark upon such drastic and untried schemes, particularly as to the issuance of printed money?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts remember, however, that the countries of continental Europe prior to the World War were intensely strong in their adherence to the gold standard, and that the principal argument made by those who opposed the campaign of Mr. Bryan in 1896 was that it was necessary that America, if she was to become a great commercial nation, should be upon the gold standard, the single gold standard, such as the other commercial nations were on at the time?

Mr. GIFFORD. I understand that, but that was not the argument of the previous speaker, the gentleman from Alabama, who stated that this Nation, above all nations, must live true to her word and true to her obligations. The difficulty I have is in trying to reconcile the attitude of those who advocate such conflicting views. I want to know how these views are to be brought into agreement.

Mr. McSWAIN. I was seeking to answer the proposition of history that prior to this time other nations had gone off the gold standard and the calamities that are predicted as about to happen now did not happen then. As a matter of fact, prior to the World War other nations did not go off the gold standard but adhered to it with the greatest rigidity.

Mr. GIFFORD. Referring to calamities, Mr. Chairman, there has been nothing but calamity to follow everything in the way of these new departures we have seen undertaken in this country in the last few years. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to pay my respects to the chairman of the subcommittee and to the members of the subcommittee for the very courteous and gracious way in which I, as the only member from the other side of the aisle, was received during the times of the hearing and the consideration of the bill. To the Members on the right side of the aisle may I say that in the hands of your capable chairman, it seems to me that the interests of the District of Columbia are certainly safely committed. With some few items we are not in accord. On those items I feel confident that probably our differences are due more to individual interests than to any purpose on the part of the chairman or his associates to underestimate certain functions of the municipal government.

I want to say just a word about the splendid appeal that was made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] in this House just a few moments ago. It seems rather a coincidence that his statement should immediately precede the appeal which I shall try to make.

No Member on the right side of the aisle could turn a deaf ear to the eloquent appeal made by the gentleman from Alabama that those things which go to the moral fiber of a people, the fulfillment of obligations, the fulfillment of solemn pledges, transcend in importance the matter of purely material needs; and, from the standpoint of one of the other party, may I add just my humble word of appreciation for the very forceful and splendid words, and the admonition given by the gentleman from Alabama.

So far as the District of Columbia appropriation bill is concerned, in most respects I am thoroughly in accord with the members of the subcommittee on the right side of the aisle. There is but one item for which I care to make an appeal today. That is the item of character education. As the bill was prepared and came to us for consideration, it provided the sum of $87,000 for character education. As we considered the bill, the majority members were persuaded and the committee report states, that in the judgment of the majority, the sum of $87,000 should be taken out of the bill, that the experiment had not proved its worth, and that the endeavor that had been put forth by the Superintendent of Education for character education should no longer be carried on. At the proper time it is my purpose to present an amendment in the hope that this $87,000 may again be made a part of the bill, in the hope that the character-education program in the District of Columbia may be continued, in the hope that the school system of the District of Columbia may provide a model for other school systems in the country to follow.

The character-education experiment was introduced in the public schools of Washington in September of 1934. It came as a result of the investigation of crime and racketeering conducted by a committee of the Senate and was endorsed in the hope that the educational facilities of the city might lend their efforts toward a solution of the crime problem and a proper appraisal of the value of character building in our community life.

It is proposed at this time to eliminate an appropriation for this purpose and to disrupt the organization which has been built up by the superintendent of schools in this commendable program. No one will be bold enough to deny that the development of character should be one of the primary functions of our school system, but there are those who believe that such a program should be relegated to a secondary place and depend for its efficiency upon haphazard and unscientific methods. I cannot join with these advocates of curtailment in character building.

The financial difficulties through which we are passing have been permitted to have a disastrous effect upon the schools. A program of social suicide has been countenanced as municipal leaders have directed their efforts of economy to those educational institutions which should be depended upon for the development of leadership, and have paid scant attention to inefficiency and wastefulness in other branches of governmental service. The fallacy of the doctrine of retrenchment in our public-school system becomes more evident as one contemplates the imperative demands for leadership in this age of uncertainty. Dependability, stability, and character are needed sorely today. Closed schoolhouses, overcrowded classrooms, depleted teaching staffs, provide a fertile field for the sowing of iniquitous seeds of un-Americanism and the cultivation of dangerous doctrines and pernicious practices. The future well-being of American life demands adequately trained, properly disciplined, and soul-inspired young people today.

It is a coincidence that today the President's message stressed the importance of the same words that he emphasized in his opening message to this Congress, namely, the matter of social security.

The President, in his opening message to the Congress, reaffirmed his previous declaration that "among our objectives I place the security of the men, women, and children of the Nation first." Certainly this commendable program must include a recognition of the value of the contribution which can be brought by the educational agencies of our land. I cannot appreciate any note of harmony between an avowed administration policy of emphasis upon social security and an evident administration program of ignoring the foundation upon which our social security must be built—the character of our people. Social security does not depend solely upon material resources. Social security cannot be obtained alone by statutes and administrative edicts. Social security does not rest only upon the regulation of business practices and the adjustment of controversial industrial issues. The security of a people springs from a sense of responsibility for the welfare of others.

It depends to a large degree on the proper appraisal of homely virtues—honesty, dependability, straightforwardness—in a word, on character. It depends on the endorsement by our people of the value of rugged righteousness and the denunciation of cunning craftiness in our everyday life. It places a premium on the value of the fulfillment of covenants and deplores the breach of solemn pledges. It cannot condone the doctrine of the excuse of expediency for the repudiation of contractual obligations. The security of a people is primarily dependent upon a sense of confidence in the honesty of purpose of others and the integrity of the program of the Government. James Truslow Adams in a recent magazine article entitled "The Crisis in Character" is the authority for the statement that the lack of character "has complicated our unhappy situation" and that the decadence in character will continue to have far-reaching effects after we have overcome the economic and political crisis through which we are passing and have restored to our people a degree of material prosperity.

I am not unmindful of the magnitude of the problems confronting the present administration nor the demands which have been made upon it. I realize that it is most difficult for a democratic government to keep its expenditures within reasonable bounds when spending is the criterion of the popularity of the administration. It is to be regretted, but we must admit that an extravagant administration may purchase its popularity with the people by an ever-increasing volume of benefactions bestowed with political favor and resulting in the ultimate prostitution of the country and the destruction of self-reliance and courage.

I deplore the fact that character education cannot be included in this program of administration expenditures. I appreciate keenly the fact that individuals, as well as Government agencies, must readjust themselves to the financial conditions of the present day. I denounce wastefulness and reckless prodigality, whether in public or in private life, but I believe we should come to a sense of relative values. Much has been said about the importance of balancing the Budget. I am in accord with those who emphasize the need of maintaining the national credit, but I am equally convinced that an economic recovery will be of little value unless those interests which have to do with character building are safeguarded and developed. It will be futile to balance the Nation's Budget and unbalance the Nation's life and spirit and character. A financial deficit can be discharged, but a social and a character deficit cannot be paid by values in lands and houses and material prosperity. I hold it as our first duty to give to our children the greatest possible advantages for physical well-being, for intellectual discipline, and the development of spiritual stability which can possibly be provided. Without these, prosperity will be barren. Demagoguery with its limited vision and selfish purpose may denounce the value of our schools and school systems, but a solemn duty rests upon us to bring the fallacies of their denunciation to the light of day.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 4 additional minutes.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman was speaking about the amendment in reference to cutting out the program pertaining to character education in the District. Did they entirely eliminate the character-building program or just reduce it somewhat?

Mr. DITTER. When the program was originally provided for last year, an allotment was made for a superintendent, counsellors, and the necessary clerical staff to carry on the experiment. We were advised at that time that they contemplated a 3-year program; that success could not come by simply inaugurating the program for a year and then letting it run its own way; that there should be a natural building up year by year until the whole program of the schools of the city are brought within the character-building experiment.

Mr. TERRY. The idea of the committee, then, is after 1 year to eliminate entirely the character-building program, as I understand the matter?

Mr. DITTER. In fairness to the members of the committee who are advocating elimination of the item, may I say it is their thought that this character-building program may be carried on by the teaching staff presently provided, and that there need not be the emphasis and the provision for counsellors and clerical assistants to carry on the work to its complete consummation. With this opinion I do not concur. To be successful it must be a systematic, coordinated program.

There is a difference in what we mean by economy. There is an economy that realizes the spirit of wastefulness, which, unfortunately, has been only too prevalent in many governmental functions. I join with that company who denounce such profligacy. But there is also an economy that countenances destruction and ruin. With this school of thought I have nothing in common. I repeat that we must come to a realization of relative values, of putting first things first, and among the first things in our democracy is the value of the public-school system in character building. There is an old saying, "It is good to know; it is better to do; it is best to be."

Character education aims and has for its purpose the molding of lives in the school system, the making of boys and girls who will not depend on what their reputation may be but will depend upon what their character is.

I ask from both sides of the House, irrespective of party lines, when the time comes for the presentation of the amendment, your support if you are interested in character education as a worthy objective in the public-school systems of this country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert certain excerpts I want to use in connection with the statement I desire to make.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I began my service in this House of Representatives with the War Congress on April 2, 1917. My distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], chairman of this committee having this bill in charge, was at that time an expert experienced parliamentarian and was then widely familiar with all affairs of the District of Columbia.

He first began his services here as parliamentarian of this House and as such served under both Democratic and Republican administrations. He was the parliamentarian for the Democratic National Conventions at San Francisco, 1920; New York, 1924; Houston, 1928; and Chicago, 1932.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri is the editor of two editions of the Manual and Digest of the House of Representatives, 1916 and 1918; is the author of A Synopsis of the Procedure of the House, 1919; of Procedure in the House of Representatives, 1920; of Cannon's Procedure, 1928; and of two editions of the Convention Parliamentary Manual. He is also the author of Treatise on Parliamentary Law in Encyclopedia Britannica, and is the editor and compiler of Precedents of the House of Representatives, authorized by act of Congress, and holds a doctor of laws degree.

Having had 23 years' familiarity with the affairs of Washington and having been for years a close student of fiscal relations between the Government and the District of Columbia, there is no better posted man in the United States than Mr. CANNON on the business, needs, and necessities of the District of Columbia.

Besides being a member of other committees, I was assigned to the Legislative Committee on the District of Columbia soon after I reached Washington. I served on that committee a number of years. I made a close detailed study of fiscal affairs, covering a period of more than 10 years. I personally checked up every office, plant, and project in the District. For several years I was the ranking Democratic member of said District of Columbia Committee.

I had the benefit of having Hon. Ben Johnson, of Kentucky, turn over to me all of his records, investigations, historical data, and facts gathered by him during the years he served as chairman of that committee before the war Congress, and before his death he related to me many times in minute detail all of the many donations in large sums this Government has made to the people of Washington, and how many hundreds of millions of dollars the District of Columbia owed the United States Government, if the Washington people had to pay it back.

While it was a great personal sacrifice for us to be away from home, Mr. CANNON, Mr. JACOBSEN, and myself spent most of the month of December, before this session met, holding hearings on this appropriation bill. These hearings embrace 871 printed pages. We had but one purpose, and that was to do full justice both to the District of Columbia and to the United States Government.

This bill appropriates $39,308,404 for the next fiscal year for the District of Columbia, and in addition to that the District has trust funds already given it of $1,430,000, and in addition to that has a cash surplus of $2,450,000, yet all of the Washington newspapers are bemeaning Mr. CANNON and myself, claiming that we have crippled the District by not giving it enough money.

During the past 6 weeks the newspapers of Washington have been carrying on a concerted campaign to try to force Congress to give the District a larger Federal contribution to civic expenses. As soon as we began the hearings, I reminded the chairman of the Board, Commissioner Hazen, that President Roosevelt's Budget fixed the Federal contribution at $5,700,000 and asked him the following questions:

Mr. BLANTON. The Budget has proposed that the Government contribute this year $5,700,000.

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And you are asking for about $3,000,000 more?

Commissioner HAZEN. About that, but the Budget did not seem to agree with us.

Mr. BLANTON. But you were asking for it?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. But you are not expecting to get it?

Commissioner HAZEN. We hope we will get it.

Mr. BLANTON. You are carrying on a concerted campaign in the city now by way of meetings and banquets, speeches and newspaper publicity, and so forth, to get that sum?

Commissioner HAZEN. We hope to get it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any Washington citizen opposing it?

Commissioner HAZEN. I have not heard of it.

Mr. BLANTON. You do not expect any opposition from Washington citizens?

Commissioner HAZEN. It is one thing to which there seems to be no opposition.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless some representatives of the people here in Congress rise up in front of you, you will have no obstacles; is that right?

Commissioner HAZEN. Oh, I think we will. I think this committee will probably oppose that.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, are not they representatives of the people?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir; representatives of the whole people.

Commissioner ALLEN. Mr. Blanton, we want to say also that we think we are representatives of the people. We do not want to be left out of that category.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; but the difference is, Mr. Commissioner, that you are representing 500,000 people of Washington and Chairman CANNON and Mr. JACOBSEN and I are representing 120,000,000 people of the United States.

Commissioner ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. You are representing a part, and we are representing the whole. There is the difference. We look at the matter from the national viewpoint, a national scope, and you are looking at it from a circumscribed viewpoint within the scope of the city.

Commissioner ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. And, of course, our views are divergent.

Commissioner ALLEN. That is correct.

When debate began on this bill yesterday, I made a statement reciting the admissions made by the District Commissioners. I gave nothing but the facts, the truth of which is clearly shown by the testimony of said Commissioners. No Member of this House made any attempt to refute any statement I made. No one could refute same. The RECORD supported my statements.

If Mr. CANNON and myself had given the District of Columbia all the Commissioners had asked for, and all the Washington newspapers wanted, we would have had the whole front, with our pictures in life size, on every newspaper in Washington, and we would have been heralded as statesmen and the greatest men in Congress. But we did not obey their mandates. And, as usual, we had to be subjected to their gaffs, their ridicule, their misrepresentations, and their usual displeasure. They have let it be known that any Member who will not criticize the appropriation bill, and any Congressman who will obey Washington newspapers, will have honorable mention, and can always get his picture and a big write-up on the front page. But many people over the United States read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. These readers of the RECORD check up on these Members who, for a little notoriety, advocate giving large sums of public money out of the Federal Treasury to pay part of the expenses of Washington people, and these readers of the RECORD calmly pass on the question whether Washington people are well cared for and whether it was necessary for them to pay so much of Washington's expenses.

So the older Members here have learned that there is no reason or excuse whatever for making the people in the States pay the expenses of Washington people, and that their constituents back home call them to account when they get too generous with the people's money, and they have quit making speeches for Washington newspapers.

I wondered yesterday just who would take the floor to make the "Washington" speech. I knew it would be someone who had not been here many terms. To my great surprise it was my good friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. He was elected to Congress in November 1932, and had served one term, and I thought that would have given him time to be better informed. He is a splendid, fine, active Member of the House, and personally I like him immensely. But he has not been here long enough to learn much about District affairs. He preluded his remarks with this statement:

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, if there were only more new Members in the Chamber at this time, I should like to disabuse their minds of some of the things that were stated here a little while ago by the distinguished gentleman and philosopher from the sagebrush country of Texas. I shall never forget as a Member of the Seventy-third Congress, listening with deep interest to the statement that was made at that time about how we frittered away the money of the people of this country and lavished it upon the people of the District of Columbia.

Why did he say I was from the "sagebrush country"? There is not a sagebrush in my entire district. I am not from the sagebrush country of Texas. He did not deny a single statement I made in my speech. He could not deny any statement, because every statement I made was proved by admissions made by the Commissioners in the printed hearings. He tried to get around my speech and the indisputable facts stated by me and quoted from the hearings by a mere wave of his hand. He said he would not attempt to disabuse the minds of new Members at that time, but promised to do so at some other time. Why did he pick new Members to disabuse their minds? Why did not he disabuse the minds of all Members? Because all the old Members knew I stated facts.

True to form, the Washington newspapers gave big headlines to Mr. DIRKSEN. He immediately became Washington's hero. I quote the following from the Washington Herald:

Caustic criticism of District residents by Representative BLANTON, of Texas, on the floor of the House yesterday after the local budget was reported, aroused Representative DIRKSEN, of Illinois, to a vigorous defense of Washingtonians.

Representative DIRKSEN said his service on the District Committee had convinced him that most of Mr. BLANTON's criticism was undeserved by the people of Washington.

Not in any particular was it shown that any fact was misstated, or that I had made any error in quoting from the hearings, or that I had made any criticism that was undeserved. There was just the lawyer's "general denial."

Now I quote from the Washington Post. It, too, ran true to form:

Almost the entire afternoon session of the House yesterday was occupied with general debate, during which Representative BLANTON, ranking member of the subcommittee, harangued regarding the advantages of living in Washington and the "propaganda" of the local newspapers.

Representative DIRKSEN (Republican), of Illinois, a member of the House District Committee, took BLANTON to task for some of his criticisms.

Because I gave facts, the Post said I "harangued." Just in what way did Mr. DIRKSEN "take me to task"? Not a denial of any fact stated by me did he make.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. I am going to put in my remarks a quotation from the hearings, and these are admissions from the District Commissioners themselves, regarding every fact I mentioned on the floor yesterday to show you that you cannot get away from the facts. You cannot wave away facts by a wave of the hand.

Mr. DITTER. Will not the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a minute. I do not want to take too much time. I want to show up some of these newspaper misstatements.

For instance, the Herald this morning in attempting to quote statements made by our distinguished and able chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], and in attempting to quote me, in great big box-car letters, states the following:

Starve needy out of city, Blanton's District of Columbia budget plan.

Representative CANNON of Missouri also suggested the relief recipients be sent back to farm—they do not belong here in Washington.

Now, all of that quotation is absolutely false. Both Mr. CANNON and myself were referring only to transients in Washington. There are over 10,000 Negro transients in Washington drawing relief, and we advised that they should go back to their homes and go to work.

THE OFFICIAL PRINTED HEARINGS

Now, I am going to quote a few excerpts from the official printed hearings which will conclusively prove every fact stated by me in my speech yesterday:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, before Major Donovan makes his statement, I desire to ask Commissioner Hazen some questions, as he is the President of the Board of Commissioners.

So that everyone may understand the matter under consideration, this bill upon which we are now holding hearings is called the "1936 bill." That is the appropriation bill for the fiscal year from July 1, 1935, to July 1, 1936.

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill upon which we held hearings early this year and for which we made appropriations, known as the "1935 bill", is for the current year that ends June 30, 1935.

Commissioner HAZEN. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. In the general statement that you made on March 7, 1934, before this subcommittee, I quote from your statement on page 5 of the hearings. You call attention to the fact that the tax rate for the present fiscal year had been reduced to $1.50, and then you use this language:

"This reduction represents a saving to taxpayers in the fiscal year 1934 of $2,445,000."

That is a fact, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. I assume so.

Mr. DONOVAN. That is about right.

Mr. BLANTON. Then you went on to say:

Moreover, in the fiscal year 1934 the assessed valuation of real estate has been reduced by $80,000,000, a saving to property owners of $1,200,000.

That is right?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. By a reduction in the assessed valuations of real estate to the extent of $80,000,000, you meant that you distributed that over the general assessments?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. But everyone was presumed to have received a decrease?

Commissioner HAZEN. It is supposed to be leveled over the entire District.

Mr. BLANTON. That is right; it was leveled over the entire District.

Mr. DONOVAN. They all got the benefit of the decrease in the tax rate.

Mr. BLANTON. Then you further state: "It is also contemplated that a further reduction in the assessed value of real estate of approximately $50,000,000 will be made in 1935."

Did you make that further reduction?

Commissioner HAZEN. There was further reduction.

Mr. BLANTON. And you did make another reduction, approximately $50,000,000, in assessed values, as noted by the assessor, Mr. Richards, of 10 percent in the assessed valuations?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And that was general all over the District?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. So that property owners generally got the benefit of that additional $50,000,000 reduction?

Commissioner HAZEN. That is quite right.

Mr. BLANTON. Then this year and last year you have given the property owners in the District a reduction in the assessed values of real estate of $130,000,000, or 15 percent, have you not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Approximately; yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Then you also say:

"The Commissioners also invite attention to the recommendation under the chapter for the water service for a 25-percent reduction in water rates for 1935, and an increase in the metered allowance now 7,500 cubic feet to 10,000 cubic feet. This means a saving to water users of about $600,000."

That was provided?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. So that the property owners of the District got a saving of $600,000 through a decrease in water charges?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. In addition to that $600,000 decrease in water charges, they also got the benefit of the increased metered allowance of 2,500 cubic feet of water?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Without extra charge?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. So that they got a double benefit in the matter of the water charges?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Then you further say:

"In the fiscal year 1934 Congress allowed a discount of 10 percent of the amount of any bill for water charges paid within 15 days after the date of the rendition thereof. It is estimated that this will mean a saving of about $100,000 to water users."

That was a saving of $100,000 additional, approximately?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. To water users here in Washington?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a fact, Mr. Commissioner, that the tax rate this year, the fiscal year 1935, is only $1.50 per 100 on real estate and only $1.50 per 100 on personal property, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no contemplation in the minds of the Commissioners to increase that tax for next year, 1936? You do not contemplate increasing it?

Commissioner HAZEN. We do not contemplate increasing it.

Mr. BLANTON. You have stated you did not contemplate that, have you not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. So far as you know now, your tax rate for next year, 1936, will be $1.50 per 100?

Commissioner HAZEN. It will, because we can meet the items in this bill with a $1.50 tax.

SURPLUS CARRIED OVER FROM FISCAL YEAR 1934 AND ESTIMATED SURPLUS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. BLANTON. With that $1.50 tax rate, you stated in your preliminary general statement that you carried over from the last fiscal year to the present fiscal year a surplus of $4,600,000?

Commissioner HAZEN. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. And you say that you will inherit next July 1 a surplus of——

Commissioner HAZEN. $2,450,000.

Mr. BLANTON. A $2,450,000 cash surplus, to help you on expenses.

Commissioner HAZEN. That is what our auditor says.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what you say?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. You have also, for this coming fiscal year, a trust fund, as you said in your general statement, of $1,430,000?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a fund to which you have access, which you get out of the Treasury, regardless of what Congress does in this bill, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Because Congress in an appropriation bill cannot repeal that.

Commissioner HAZEN. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. It takes a legislative act to repeal that?

Commissioner HAZEN. That is right.

Mr. BLANTON. So you have got that much cash to start on, have you not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. You have no income tax for the District of Columbia?

Commissioner HAZEN. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Such as other cities and States have?

Commissioner HAZEN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. And you have no inheritance tax here in the District of Columbia?

Commissioner HAZEN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. In the Congress before last there were introduced and passed by the House of Representatives unanimously, but were pigeonholed and died in the Senate, what are known as the "Mapes bills", following exhaustive hearings by a regular select committee known as the "Mapes committee." One of said bills so passed unanimously by the House provided for an income tax for the District. That is so, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Are you recommending any income tax for the District?

Commissioner HAZEN. We have not in this Congress; no, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you intend to recommend one?

Commissioner HAZEN. I cannot speak for the Board, Mr. Blanton.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you favor an inheritance tax for the District?

Commissioner HAZEN. Mr. Blanton, I have not given it sufficient study.

Mr. BLANTON. You are not ready to speak on that?

Commissioner HAZEN. No.

Mr. CANNON. In previous hearings, the Board of Commissioners have gone on record, have they not, as favoring the levying of an income tax and an inheritance tax for the District?

Mr. BLANTON. I thought so, and I was trying to get their present attitude on it.

Mr. CANNON. Evidently there has been a change in the attitude of the Board of Commissioners.

INTANGIBLE TAX

Mr. BLANTON. The tax on intangibles in the District is one-half of 1 percent. That is a fact?

Commissioner HAZEN. I believe so.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is a fact that up to this date the amount that is collected on intangibles is almost infinitesimal, is it not?

Mr. DONOVAN. Oh, no; $2,000,000 a year, Mr. BLANTON.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; when you consider the hundreds of millions of dollars that are stored away in these lock boxes in the safe-deposit vaults in Washington—if you could get at them—you would find hundreds of millions of dollars of intangibles that could be taxed. Do you not think so, Major?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to say that, in my opinion, we ought to get a great deal more than we do from the present tax on intangibles.

Mr. BLANTON. Do you not think that there are hundreds of millions of dollars stored away in lock boxes here?

Mr. DONOVAN. I would not say how much. But I believe we ought to get more money than $2,000,000 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. You mean at that rate it should be more than $2,000,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Has there ever been, so far as you know, since you have been connected with the District government, a prosecution against anyone for making a false return on intangibles?

Commissioner HAZEN. Not that I recall; no criminal action.

INTANGIBLES REACHED WHEN RICH MEN DIE

Mr. Chairman, if my colleagues will look on page 11 of the printed hearings, they will see that between January and November 1934 there were 76 wills probated in the District of Columbia, where each one of these 76 estates held a large amount of intangible assets, which theretofore had been untaxed. Their names and amounts are shown. One estate owned $82,000, another $115,000, another $105,000, another $96,000, another $335,000, and another $1,064,400 in intangible assets, which before their death had been locked up in tin boxes in bank vaults. After a man dies the title to his securities listed in his name cannot be passed to his heirs until they go through the probate court. Hence after death these intangibles come out of lockboxes and reach the light of day.

I now quote further from the official printed hearings:

GASOLINE TAX

Mr. BLANTON. In the District of Columbia there is a gasoline tax of 2 cents a gallon?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. That is in addition to the 1 cent Federal tax?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. In many States their State tax, in addition to their Federal tax, ranges from 5 cents to 9 cents a gallon. For instance, in Tennessee it is 7 cents. In Virginia, what is it?

Commissioner HAZEN. Five cents.

Mr. BLANTON. In Maryland it is now 4 cents?

Commaissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The Mapes bill to provide for an extra tax on gasoline was passed in the House of Representatives unanimously, there being not a vote against it, on December 17, 1931. The bill was H. R. 5823. It was pigeonholed and died in the Senate.

Have you any objection to that bill, or a similar bill, being passed by the present Congress?

Commissioner HAZEN. No, sir; I am speaking now personally, of course.

LICENSE-TAG TAX

Mr. BLANTON. In the District of Columbia there is a license-tag tax that people pay in order to get their license plates each year. That amounts to only $1 per car.

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. That would be $1 per car for an $8,000 Rolls-Royce limousine as well as a dollar per car for a Ford or a Chevrolet?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. They are all the same?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. In some States the fee on a Rolls-Royce would be $40. In the District it would be a dollar. That is a fact, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. For the tag.

Mr. BLANTON. In the Mapes bill, introduced in and passed by the House of Representatives by unanimous vote on December 17, 1931, but which died in the Senate, there was a provision to increase the cost of license tags upon automobiles, and to provide a comparable tax on trucks that do an interstate business through the District from New York to Texas. Is there any objection to that bill being passed by Congress?

Commissioner HAZEN. I think there ought to be a larger tax on automobiles.

Mr. BLANTON. But both Fords and Rolls-Royces each pay just $1 for license-number plates here in Washington. In the calendar year 1933, in Maryland, the registration fee on a Chevrolet or a Ford was $8.64. That is right over across the line, 4 miles from the Capitol. Compare that with $1 charged Rolls-Royces in the District. You have no objection to legislation being passed to increase that tax to make it a fair tax, have you?

Commissioner HAZEN. Well, we have thought of a weight tax. We will discuss that matter later.

Mr. BLANTON. Have you any recommendations prepared to submit to Congress regarding a tax on these trucks that wear out your streets here?

Commissioner HAZEN. We will have.

Mr. BLANTON. Have you any at the present time?

Commissioner HAZEN. Not at this time.

WATER TAX

Mr. BLANTON. In the District of Columbia the average water tax per family is now approximately what?

Mr. DONOVAN. It is about $8.75.

Mr. BLANTON. Was not that the tax before Congress reduced it?

Mr. DONOVAN. It was that before Congress reduced it.

Mr. BLANTON. But Congress reduced it?

Mr. DONOVAN. You mean the 25-percent reduction?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. DONOVAN. If you take the 25 percent off——

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about what they now actually pay per family per year for water.

Mr. DONOVAN. With the 25 percent off and the increase in the metered allowance, it is probably around——

Mr. BLANTON. About $6.75 per year per family for water?

Mr. DONOVAN. That or a little under.

Mr. BLANTON. Per year, per family for splendid water. Mr. Commissioner, is not that a remarkably low charge for water?

Commissioner HAZEN. I do not know.

Mr. BLANTON. Allowing 10,000 cubic feet for a flat rate like that per family per year for $6.75 or approximately 50 cents per month for water?

Commissioner HAZEN. Of course, it covers all operating expenses and allows for extensions. How it compares with the charge in other cities, I do not know.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a special privilege that Washington people enjoy here that the citizens of many other cities do not enjoy. You realize that that is a low rate?

Colonel SULTAN. It is low; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The colonel knows about that.

Colonel SULTAN. For filtered water, it is very low.

Commissioner HAZEN. I am told it is one of the lowest.

Mr. BLANTON. The water charges in most of our cities are much higher. In the summertime some people in other cities pay as much as $25 a month for water to keep their lawns and trees alive, and then they cannot get all of the water they need.

Commissioner HAZEN. It does, however, take care of all expenses and upkeep—the present rate.

Mr. BLANTON. In Maryland, just across the line, a few miles from the Capitol, the water charge for a family of three is $14, just double what it is in Washington.

CONNECTIONS WITH SEWER SYSTEM

In the District of Columbia a man who built a house 25 years ago and then paid for having his house connected with the sewer system of the District has not in the last 25 years had to pay a single additional monthly service charge for sewers, has he?

Commissioner HAZEN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. And he will not have to pay any in the future, will he?

Commissioner HAZEN. No, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. After he once connects with the sewer, there is no service charge at all thereafter?

Commissioner HAZEN. I think not.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a special privilege that Washington people enjoy that is not enjoyed by citizens of other communities—by citizens of many other communities, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. After the property owner installs his connection with the sewer system, there is no charge from then on.

Mr. BLANTON. I say that is a privilege that they enjoy here?

Commissioner HAZEN. Surely it is a privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. For instance, in Abilene, Tex., I am paying $3 a month for such service.

Commissioner HAZEN. For sewer?

Mr. BLANTON. For sewer service, paid every month.

Commissioner HAZEN. Is that so?

Mr. BLANTON. $3 every month, as everyone is required to pay so much for every connection in the house, for every lavatory, every toilet, every spigot that you have in your house you have got to pay a certain charge. Such a system exists in many cities.

Now, paying no monthly service charge is a privilege that the Washington people enjoy, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Surely it is.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO FEDERAL EXPENSES OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BLANTON. Now, with regard to paving in the years during which there was so much paving done in the District. During those years there was a system whereby the Federal Government paid 50 percent of all the expenses of the city of Washington?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And streets were paved, fine schools were built, playgrounds were acquired, and bridges were built, the court buildings, hospitals, asylums, and jail were constructed, and general improvements were made on that same basis. Our water system and sewer system were thus acquired and perfected. This bridge out on Connecticut Avenue that is known as the "million dollar" bridge was built that way, the United States paying half of its cost.

Commissioner HAZEN. It is the Taft Bridge now.

Mr. BLANTON. For many years it was called the "million dollar bridge", because it cost a million dollars.

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Also a number of other important bridges and many fine school buildings having been built under that same arrangement. Then after that there was a period when the amount that the Government paid was reduced to a basis of 60-40; is that right?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The Government then paid 40 percent and the District 60 percent?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

BENEFITS TO CITY FROM NATIONAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Commissioner, within the last 20 years the Government of the United States has spent for permanent improvements in the way of beautiful public buildings in Washington $200,000,000. That is a great asset to Washington, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. It certainly is.

Mr. BLANTON. And the press of Washington last week stated that during this month there were to be 19 big national conventions held in Washington. That is a tremendous help to Washington, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. To the business of Washington, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Those people spend their money when they come here for hotels, and for buying things at the stores, and so forth.

Commissioner HAZEN. It is a good thing for business, but a bad thing for the police department.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is a wonderful thing for the business of Washington, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. It is something that the chambers of commerce all over the United States in the big cities pay hundreds of thousands of dollars for every year, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, is there a building in Washington that is owned by this Government that is not an asset to Washington? Can you tell me of one that is not?

Commissioner HAZEN. I would say that some of these buildings down in the Mall are not good assets.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the permanent buildings. Are they assets to Washington?

Commissioner HAZEN. I would think so.

Mr. BLANTON. You would admit that they are assets to Washington?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The people all over the United States come here to see these big public buildings, do they not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. This new $10,000,000 Supreme Court Building is one of the beauty sights of Washington, and this $14,000,000 Memorial Bridge that the Government built here is a wonderful asset to Washington, is it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The people of Washington did not pay anything for it, did they?

Commissioner HAZEN. I think not.

Mr. DONOVAN. Except the approaches.

Mr. BLANTON. I am talking about the $14,000,000 that we spent out of the Treasury for the Memorial Bridge. That was paid for out of the Public Treasury, was it not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Every person in Washington uses that bridge, do they not?

Commissioner HAZEN. I suspect that most of them do.

Mr. BLANTON. And all of the splendid parks, and there are 1,200 of them here in Washington, little and big, are used by the people and enjoyed by them, are they not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is a wonderful asset to the people of Washington.

Then, we have one of the greatest Zoos in the United States here in Washington, have we not?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And the 87,000 school children of Washington attend it regularly, do they not?

Commissioner HAZEN. They attend it. I do not know how regularly.

Mr. BLANTON. But they do attend it?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Swarms of them?

Commissioner HAZEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Commissioner, you have been a public servant for a long time, and you are intimately acquainted with every detail of Washington business and history. On the whole, can you cite the people of any city of the United States who have better privileges, who are better cared for, than those in the city of Washington?

Commissioner HAZEN. I think that it is the greatest city in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. And Washington people are better cared for, are least taxed, and have greater privileges than any other people in the United States?

Commissioner HAZEN. I believe they do.

Mr. BLANTON (to Mr. CANNON). Do you mind, Mr. Chairman, our giving that out to the Washington press to offset the vigorous compaign it is now making to force Congress to give Washington people several million dollars more in a Federal contribution.

Mr. CANNON. I see no reason why there should be any objection.

Mr. BLANTON. That is all; thank you.

My colleagues will note that Commissioner Hazen, president of the Board of Commissioners for the District of Columbia, admitted that the people of Washington are better cared for, are least taxed, and have greater privileges than any other people in the United States.

I will assert without fear of contradiction that the city officials and employees of the District of Columbia, a city of 500,000 people, receive larger salaries than do the officials of any other city of comparable size in the whole world. And regularly each month their salaries are paid in spot cash, and they have never had to wait for payment, or discount their pay to get the cash. It is always forthcoming promptly on the date of payment. And it is promptly spent, so that all business men of Washington get the benefit of it.

And the 100,000 Government employees here in Washington regular spend most of their cash earnings here each month. The business men of Washington get the benefit of their salaries. They get most of the salaries of Congressmen. They get most of the salaries of United States Senators.

If you will look on pages 104 to 110 of the printed hearings, you will see the salaries paid officials of the District of Columbia, and when I mention same I mean basic salaries. The Commissioners receive $9,000 per annum and are furnished an automobile. The city secretary gets $5,600. The purchasing officer gets $5,400. The inspector of buildings gets $5,800. The tax assessor gets $7,500. The tax collector gets $6,000. The deputy assessor gets $5,600. There are 7 assistant assessors who receive $4,800 each. The city auditor gets $9,000. He has 12 assistants, who receive from $2,600 to $4,600. The corporation counsel gets $9,000. He has 16 assistants, who get from $2,600 to $7,000 each. The coroner gets $3,200. The superintendent of weights and measures gets $3,700. The architect gets $7,500. He has 39 assistants, who receive from $2,600 to $5,600 each. The public utilities has 15 employees, who receive from $2,600 to $5,000 each. The superintendent of insurance gets $4,600. The surveyor gets $5,000. The director of traffic gets $7,500. The chief librarian gets $8,000. He has 15 assistants, who get from $2,600 to $4,600 each. The register of wills gets $6,400. The recorder of deeds gets $5,500. The director of highways gets $7,500. The tree superintendent gets $5,200. The sewer director gets $7,500. The refuse supervisor gets $6,000, and 2 assistants $5,000 each, and 11 other assistants who get from $2,600 to $3,800 each. The playgrounds supervisor gets $4,600. The health officer gets $7,000. He has 25 assistants, who get from $2,600 to $5,600 each. The director of public welfare gets $8,000. The juvenile judge gets $7,000. The Gallinger superintendent gets $7,500. The superintendent of schools gets $10,000. The water superintendent gets $5,800. And the hundreds of other employees get proportionate salaries.

I now quote from page 63 of the printed hearings:

PERSONAL PROPERTY EXEMPTIONS

Mr. BLANTON. What is the exemption that is allowed each family for purposes of taxation?

Mr. RICHARDS. On household goods?

Mr. BLANTON. On everything. What are the exemptions?

Mr. RICHARDS. Only household goods.

Mr. BLANTON. Amounting to what—$1,000?

Mr. RICHARDS. $1,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Each family in the District is allowed an exemption from taxes on household goods of $1,000?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And in addition to that their libraries?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If a man owned $1,000 worth of household furniture and he had a $100,000 private library, he would have $101,000 worth of property exempt from taxation?

Mr. RICHARDS. Yes, sir.

Every time the Government wants a piece of property, the Washington citizens who sit on the jury to assess the amount the Government must pay for it, invariably charge the Government about twice what it is worth. I quote the hearings from page 47 to show this:

Mr. CANNON. There is one piece of property that in September 1919 sold for $4,500 but for which the jury compelled the Government to award $11,500.

Here is one piece of property, lot no. 40, which in June 1919 sold for $12,000, and for which the Government had to pay $25,000.

Here is another piece of property, lot no. 32, an inside lot, which on July 19, 1922, sold for $3,800, and for which the Government was required to pay $8,250.

Here are two lots which in November 1923 sold for $16,500, which cost the Government, under the award of the jury, $37,500; and another lot which in August 1922 sold for $11,000, but for which the Government was charged $28,500.

Here is another lot, lot no. 832, which in January 1919 sold for $3,500, but for which the jury awarded $12,500.

I recall the first jury that was empaneled for the fixing of the value of the site for the Jefferson Junior High School, and it fixed the value of the property at $105,000. A second jury increased that to $294,000. That must have been another case where the jury was subject to other influence than the merits of the case.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, in the first award that was made on that property, I testified. I do not believe any property in that locality is worth over $1 a foot. Three men got on the stand and testified that it was worth $5 a foot.

LOCAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE IN WASHINGTON

Mr. BLANTON. Where did you come from?

Miss MERRITT. My legal residence happens to be New York, because I was there——

Mr. BLANTON. That is where practically all of Miss Perkins' employees have come from, all the way down the line.

Miss MERRITT. I was from Chicago just before that, but——

Mr. BLANTON. But your legal residence is New York?

Miss MERRITT. I just by accident have a legal residence there.

Mr. BLANTON. When did Miss Perkins notify you to come?

Miss MERRITT. I was appointed on the 17th of September this year.

Mr. BLANTON. What salary do you draw?

Miss MERRITT. $3,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Who is over you?

Miss MERRITT. Directly, Mr. Young, who is manager of the District office.

Mr. BLANTON. He is not here now?

Miss MERRITT. He is in California, on a business trip.

Mr. BLANTON. He is having a good time out there, in Hollywood?

Miss MERRITT. I hope so.

Mr. BLANTON. How long has he been gone?

Miss MERRITT. About 3 weeks, and will be back at the end of this week.

Mr. BLANTON. And that will be a month that he has been out at Hollywood?

Miss MERRITT. In California, looking into the California employment service, with reference to their coming under the Wagner-Peyser Act.

Mr. BLANTON. Yet he is at the head of the employment service for Washington, the District of Columbia, which has nothing to do with California; is that right?

Miss MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. You do not look after California, do you, as his assistant?

Miss MERRITT. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there are three District employees working there now?

Miss MERRITT. In addition to the janitor.

Mr. BLANTON. And there are 25 that were appointed by Miss Perkins' Department?

Miss MERRITT. Yes.

HEAD OF CHILDREN'S TUBERCULOSIS HOSPITAL

Mr. BLANTON. You are a regular, practicing physician?

Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. A graduate of what school?

Dr. FINUCANE. Of Georgetown University.

Mr. BLANTON. And your age is what?

Dr. FINUCANE. Thirty-one, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. You graduated when?

Dr. FINUCANE. In 1927.

Mr. BLANTON. How long have you been connected with this sanatorium?

Dr. FINUCANE. I was appointed in February.

Mr. BLANTON. Of this year?

Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. By whom?

Dr. FINUCANE. By the District Commissioners, on the recommendation of the Board of Public Welfare.

Mr. BLANTON. After your graduation from the Georgetown University, how many years' practice did you have in your medical profession?

Dr. FINUCANE. I have had no private practice at all.

Mr. BLANTON. What pay did you get at the first hospital?

Dr. FINUCANE. At the first hospital I did not receive any pay.

Mr. BLANTON. You served your first year without pay?

Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Just for the experience?

Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. And the next 2 years you were paid what?
Dr. FINUCANE. I started at Mount McGregor being paid $50 a month.
Mr. BLANTON. And you ended by being paid what?
Dr. FINUCANE. $75 a month.
Mr. BLANTON. You worked the first year as an interne there at Mount McGregor for $50 a month?
Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. And the second year for $75?
Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. Then you went where?
Dr. FINUCANE. To the Tuberculosis Hospital in Washington, D. C.
Mr. BLANTON. You entered that when?
Dr. FINUCANE. In July 1930.
Mr. BLANTON. In what capacity?
Dr. FINUCANE. As assistant resident physician.
Mr. BLANTON. At what salary?
Dr. FINUCANE. $80 a month.
Mr. BLANTON. You were there how long?
Dr. FINUCANE. Up until I was appointed as superintendent of the children's institution.
Mr. BLANTON. This year?
Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. Give the committee the mutations in your salary from the time you went there at $80 a month until you left.
Dr. FINUCANE. I received $80 a month until the position was classified in December of 1930, I believe it was, at $2,600 a year as the basic salary.
Mr. BLANTON. Then you jumped, immediately after being here 6 months, from $80 a month to how much?
Dr. FINUCANE. A basic salary of $2,600.
Mr. BLANTON. You have drawn that ever since while you were there?
Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. And then you left there in the first part of this year at the salary of $2,600 and entered this new tuberculosis sanatorium at a salary of what?
Dr. FINUCANE. A basic salary of $3,800.
Mr. BLANTON. Then you jumped by an increase of $1,200 over night?
Dr. FINUCANE. Yes, sir.

Statement showing number of men in each grade and salaries, District of Columbia fire department

|---|---|
| 1 chief engineer | $8,000 |
| 2 deputy chief engineers | 5,000 |
| 16 battalion chief engineers | 4,500 |
| 1 fire marshal | 5,000 |
| 1 deputy fire marshal | 3,000 |
| 7 inspectors | 2,460 |
| 47 captains | 3,000 |
| 46 lieutenants | 2,840 |
| 49 sergeants | 2,600 |

| 2 assistant marine engineers | 2,460 |
| 2 marine firemen | 2,100 |
| 690 privates | 1,900–2,400 |

Total uniformed personnel, 870.

The salaries to the officers and 1,304 patrolmen on the Metropolitan Police force in Washington are comparable to the above salaries paid to firemen.

SALARIES OF SCHOOL OFFICERS

I quote the following from the evidence of Superintendent Ballou:

Mr. BLANTON. Your salary is $10,000, and it has been $10,000 for how long?
Dr. BALLOU. Oh, for several years; I have forgotten what year it was made that.
Mr. BLANTON. Since 1927?
Dr. BALLOU. About that time, I should think.
Mr. BLANTON. The basic salary of your assistant now is what?
Dr. BALLOU. The next lower salary is for the first assistant superintendents, and their salaries run from five to six thousand dollars.
Mr. BLANTON. Practically all of them by reason of their seniority are getting $6,000 now?
Dr. BALLOU. Most of them are, but I think not all of them.
Mr. BLANTON. Your assistant superintendents get what?
Dr. BALLOU. From $4,200 to $4,700.
Mr. BLANTON. And they get $4,700 now?
Dr. BALLOU. Not all of them, but most of them.
Mr. BLANTON. How many assistant superintendents have you?
Dr. BALLOU. We have five.
Mr. BLANTON. Do not all five of them get $4,700?
Dr. BALLOU. No; because one was appointed last year. She was appointed at $4,200, less the reduction.
Mr. BLANTON. Then four of them get $4,700?
Dr. BALLOU. Yes; I think so.
Mr. BLANTON. They used to get $3,500?
Dr. BALLOU. Yes; approximately.
Mr. BLANTON. You get the same salary that a United States Senator and Member of Congress gets; that is, the same basic salary?
Dr. BALLOU. So I understand, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. And that is $1,000 more than the basic salary of the Commissioners, which is $9,000?
Dr. BALLOU. I do not know what their salary is, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. It is $9,000. I will ask you if it is not a fact that a great many full professors in first-class universities are getting far less than $10,000?
Dr. BALLOU. Without doubt.
Mr. BLANTON. Are there not a great many full professorships in many of the principal universities whose pay is not more than $5,000?
Dr. BALLOU. I do not know, but I should presume there were.
Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that there are presidents of various universities who are getting not more than $6,000?
Dr. BALLOU. I presume that is so, but I have no definite knowledge of that.

SALARIES OF HIGH-SCHOOL TEACHERS

Mr. BLANTON. Are there not some that get $3,200?
Dr. BALLOU. There is a superior-salary class which ranges from $2,900 to $3,200.
Mr. BLANTON. How many high-school teachers are getting $3,200?
Dr. BALLOU. I could not answer that offhand.
Mr. BLANTON. There are a great many, are there not?
Dr. BALLOU. No; not a large number. There have been only 30, 40, or 50 promoted in any given year, and that plan has only been in operation 4 or 5 years.
Mr. BLANTON. How many would you say, according to your best judgment, get $3,200 now as their basic salary, and will get it during this next fiscal year?
Dr. BALLOU. There are 136 teachers in the superior-salary class in the high schools, and there are 488 who are not in that salary class in the high schools.

TEACHERS ELSEWHERE IN THE UNITED STATES

(Statement of Dr. J. D. Sandefer, president Hardin-Simmons University, Abilene, Tex.)

Mr. CANNON. We have with us this morning Dr. J. D. Sandefer and shall be glad to have a statement from him. Judge BLANTON will preside.
Mr. BLANTON. You are Dr. J. D. Sandefer, of Abilene, Tex.?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. You have been in New York for a couple of weeks on business and are on your way home, going through Washington?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. And I asked you to come here?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes, sir.
Mr. BLANTON. Doctor, there is, is there not, at Abilene, Tex., a university of the first class, known as the Hardin-Simmons University?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. That is a university of the first class?
Dr. SANDEFER. Well, it ranks with other schools in Texas calling themselves universities. Of course, some of the others have courses in law and medicine and are a great deal more comprehensive, but our work is accredited everywhere, both for the undergraduate degrees and for the M. A. work. We do not offer anything beyond an M. A. degree.
Mr. BLANTON. You are recognized in the United States and in Europe, are you not?
Dr. SANDEFER. Our graduates are accepted in all of the standard institutions of learning in this country, and the Ambassador from France wrote us many years ago and said that any of our students wanting to take the doctor's work in France would have their work for that accepted at face value.
Mr. BLANTON. You have been president of the Hardin-Simmons University for 26 years?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. And Hardin-Simmons University is a member of the Southern Association?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. Is that the university that has what is known as the "cowboys' band", that has an international reputation, that is internationally known?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. Is it the one which went to Europe a few years ago?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. And toured Europe?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. And you went with them?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. And it has been down in Old Mexico?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. And is going back to Europe next year?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. You have been to New York many times?
Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. Is Mr. Walker, the city editor of the New York Tribune, related to you by blood or marriage?
Dr. SANDEFER. He is my son-in-law; he married my second daughter.

Mr. BLANTON. Doctor, the main reason I have asked you here is to get some idea about salaries that are paid in universities, including the ones in this vicinity, and to find out something about the deductions in salaries that have been made during the depression in universities.

As president of the Hardin-Simmons University before the depression came, what was your basic salary?

Dr. SANDEFER. Mine, individually?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; as president of the university?

Dr. SANDEFER. $6,000.

Mr. BLANTON. In reference to Dr. Olsen, who has been with your university a long time, what qualifications has he? He is a graduate of what university?

Dr. SANDEFER. He is a Ph. D. from Yale, and he did additional graduate work in Berlin and in Cambridge, England.

Mr. BLANTON. He has been professor of what for how long?

Dr. SANDEFER. He has been professor of physics for 32 years.

Mr. BLANTON. What was his basic salary before the depression?

Dr. SANDEFER. It was $3,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Who holds the chair of mathematics down there in your university?

Dr. SANDEFER. Dr. Burnham.

Mr. BLANTON. What was his basic salary before the depression?

Dr. SANDEFER. $3,000.

Mr. BLANTON. What was the basic salary of your professor of Latin?

Dr. SANDEFER. Twenty-four hundred dollars. We do not class her as a full professor. She is head of the department, but we class her as an associate, and therefore the salary is put at $2,400.

Mr. BLANTON. Have you any lady director of playgrounds drawing $4,600 a year down there?

Dr. SANDEFER. No; we do not have any director of playgrounds.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a Miss Head, who has been the matron in your girls' dormitory a good many years?

Dr. SANDEFER. For 12 or 15 years.

Mr. BLANTON. And she is from one of the best families in the South, is she not?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What was her basic salary before the depression?

Dr. SANDEFER. A hundred dollars a month and her living. She has a room and an office in the dormitory.

Mr. BLANTON. What does Dr. Stevenson, your professor of politics, get?

Dr. SANDEFER. Twenty-four hundred dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. You also have a man there who is quite a well-known scientist, a Dr. Richardson?

Dr. SANDEFER. He is an historian, the author of two books recently off the press.

Mr. BLANTON. He is connected with various scientific institutions and organizations?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. He is president of a Texas archeological association, is he not?

Dr. SANDEFER. He is an officer.

Mr. BLANTON. What salary does he get, Doctor?

Dr. SANDEFER. $3,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Those were all predepression salaries?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Since the depression, what is your present salary as president of the university?

Dr. SANDEFER. Thirty-six hundred dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. What do the other full professors, like Dr. Olsen, get now?

Dr. SANDEFER. They draw $250 a month for the 9 months. If they should do work in the summertime, there would be a supplement to that.

Mr. BLANTON. All of them have taken cuts?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the greatest cut you yourself have taken during the depression?

Dr. SANDEFER. Those in the lower brackets took cuts amounting to 25 percent, and those cuts run up to my own cut of nearly 50 percent.

You understand, where the money for salaries does not come in regularly I do not get my $300 a month. I got $2,700 a year once and $2,900 one year.

Mr. BLANTON. After cutting your salary from $6,000 to $3,600, when do you get the $3,600? Have there yet been made any restorations in salaries or cuts?

Dr. SANDEFER. No.

Mr. BLANTON. You have not been able to make any restorations yet?

Dr. SANDEFER. No; not yet.

Mr. BLANTON. You have a corps of professors composed of some forty-odd men?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Have any of them quit you?

Dr. SANDEFER. We have not lost anyone.

Mr. BLANTON. They have all stayed with you?

Dr. SANDEFER. Every one.

Mr. BLANTON. And been loyal to the institution?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes; every one.

Mr. BLANTON. As president of a university, I wish you would state what the situation is as to there being many applications from men with degrees of Ph. D. from eastern universities for positions at those low salaries. Do you have many such applications?

Dr. SANDEFER. Dozens of them.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they from men who are graduates of recognized, big universities, like Yale, Harvard, Cornell, Princeton, and Columbia?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes; from the leading universities of the Nation.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they or not anxious to work at low salaries?

Dr. SANDEFER. They have been; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And apply for those positions?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this a fair picture of your plant there [indicating photograph]?

Dr. SANDEFER. That is an exact reproduction of the university plant of 12 buildings, the layout of the campus, the trees, and everything.

Mr. BLANTON. Your campus embraces about 40 acres?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes. That is just as it appears from the air. Those buildings are all there, and, incidentally, they have all been built during my 26 years.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I wanted Dr. Sandefer merely to give the committee an idea of what is going on in other places than Washington.

Let me ask you one other question. From your familiarity with school matters, what is the average salary of grade-school teachers in our graded schools in our city of Abilene, of 25,000 people?

Dr. SANDEFER. They did run as low as $65.

Mr. BLANTON. You mean $65 a month?

Dr. SANDEFER. Yes; for the 9 months. They are raised now. I think I can speak fairly accurately when I say they are raised to $80 and $85, up to $100 or $110 or $115. I do not have the last figures.

Mr. BLANTON. At one time you think they did get as low as $65 during the depression?

Dr. SANDEFER. A few of them.

I wonder what the constituents of my good friend, Mr. DIRKSEN, back in Illinois would think if they knew that from this floor he had criticised the members of a committee that did nothing in the world but call the attention of this House to the fact that the taxes here in Washington are lower than anywhere else in the United States. Where he and his people pay a big gasoline tax in Illinois, they pay 2 cents here. Where they have an income tax there, they have none here. Where they have an inheritance tax in Illinois, they have none here. Where they have a license-tag tax there according to the kind of automobile used, here they have an auto tax of only $1 for all cars. They pay $1.50 here as a total tax that embraces schools and everything else, while in Illinois they have a State tax and a county tax and a city tax, as well as school taxes and various other kinds of taxation. While here in Washington they have an intangible tax of one-half of 1 percent, with hundreds of millions of intangibles in lockboxes escaping all taxation, but in Illinois they are taxed in a great amount. If his people could know all the facts, would they approve of his criticism of this committee?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. DITTER. In view of the fact that my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is not in the Chamber at the present time——

Mr. BLANTON. He is busy on other official business elsewhere in the Capitol.

Mr. DITTER. He is unavoidably absent in committee meeting.

Mr. BLANTON. Most of the time he is here.

Mr. DITTER. May I remind the gentleman from Texas of the fact that the gentleman from Illinois is a member of the District of Columbia Committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; but just a new member. While he is able and energetic, he has not been a member long enough to find out conditions here.

Mr. DITTER. But the gentleman from Texas will concede that during his first term, no man in the House was so willing to carry his share of the work of the House or more adaptable than the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; I will admit that, because I am his friend. I prefaced my remarks by saying that he is a splendid, active, new legislator.

Mr. DITTER. And conscientious.

Mr. BLANTON. To the highest degree.

Mr. DITTER. And the gentleman wants to encourage him now as a new man.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; and after he stays here 8 or 10 or 15 years longer and learns all about the intricate, devious ways that Washington has of getting money out of the Public Treasury, then I will say, "Brother DIRKSEN, you know as much as we do about these things." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have not criticized the Washington people. I have not denounced them. I have merely given a recitation of the facts. I have merely put things in the RECORD that their own Commissioners have stated. Who are their Commissioners? Mr. Hazen, who is the chairman of the Board, for 30 years has been an official of the District government. For many years he was the surveyor of the District and he knows the history of the District of Columbia.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I take the floor this afternoon to discuss a very important matter. I have today introduced two very important measures, both of which deal with the improvement of the rural roads of the whole United States. Each and every Congressman here will be interested in these bills, for a very large majority of you have many rural roads in your districts, and everyone is forced to admit that the whole country, city and rural, is benefited by what will benefit those who produce the food, the lumber, the cotton, and the minerals of the country.

The growth and development of the legislation providing for Federal aid to public roads has been gradual and fairly progressive and consistent. The first Federal-aid laws, under which we operate now, have their practical bases in the law of 1916 and the law of 1921. These laws are still operative. The amounts provided under those laws have varied as time progressed.

In 1933 Congress took a step forward in providing money for road improvement. One of the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act provided that $400,000,000 should be divided among the several States. The division was made along fair lines. Twelve and one-half percent was divided among the States according to population, and the remainder was divided according to area, and road mileage, and population. This appropriation was made only for a limited time, and the same is not now in effect.

In 1934 Congress again enacted special legislation for another limited time. Under the provisions of the Hayden-Cartwright bill $200,000,000 was appropriated to be divided among the several States according to the same provisions as those provided in the National Industrial Recovery Act, except that this bill carried what was known as the "Jenkins amendment." This amendment provided that not less than 25 percent of the appropriation to any State shall be applied to secondary or feeder roads, including farm-to-market roads, rural mail routes, and public-school bus routes.

This amendment was offered from the floor and was adopted. The fairness of the amendment appealed to all Congressmen familiar with rural road conditions.

The Hayden-Cartwright bill was only a temporary measure and will not continue into the coming year. If it is reenacted it should carry an amendment making the 25 percent amendment more certain of enforcement. The Federal Highway Department, which apparently is very jealous of its power and prestige, failed to enter into the spirit of this amendment granting relief for the rural people, but on the contrary restricted its activities until it was practically impotent in some States, especially Ohio. Likewise some of the highway directors also failed to appreciate their responsibility to the rural people. Especially was this true in Ohio. If the State road officers in Ohio had done their duty there would have been $2,000,000 spent on Ohio rural roads in 1934. They failed miserably. The reason for this failure on the part of these high road officials is that they are sold on the idea of building main thoroughfares and expensive and elegant bridges, to which they can point with pride as a monument to their own ability. They fail utterly to appreciate the importance of the rural roads. There is no question but that road construction offers the best method of public-works relief. A road is usable immediately after it is finished. While I am much in favor of reforestation and erosion projects, these must usually run for some years before their utility is appreciated. Not so with roads. Good roads improve the value of lands as well as provide comfort and many other advantages to those who can use them. The construction of country roads calls for a very large percentage of what is called "general labor." The common everyday man in country and city is given an opportunity to work. There are not many highly skilled men or artisans employed; still there are a few.

I have been surprised that the President has not seen fit to lay special stress on road construction from the standpoint of usefulness and public benefit now and in the future. I hope he does yet take special notice of the importance of those projects.

The following is a copy of one of the bills which I introduced today:

H. R. 4121

A bill to amend the Federal Aid Road Act approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of extending the benefits of the Federal Aid Road Act more equitably to the rural sections of the United States, the said act be, and hereby is, amended to provide that out of any and all moneys apportioned to the several States under the terms of said act for any fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, not less than 25 percent of the apportionment to any State shall be applied to the construction or reconstruction of rural roads lying outside the 7-percent Federal-aid system, which rural roads shall be such as the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine to be primarily of service to the rural population in the operation of public-school bus routes, rural free-delivery mail routes, and star mail routes. No part of such 25 percent is to be used for the construction or reconstruction of a highway or road which has been designated as a part of a Federal or State highway system eligible to participate in Federal aid.

This bill seeks to amend the original law of 1916 and 1921 so that 25 percent of whatever is appropriated by the Federal Government to the various States should be used exclusively on rural roads. If this bill is passed, the Federal Highway Department and the State highway department will be compelled to use this amount of this money on rural roads. They will not then be able to conjure up any excuses. This will allow 75 percent to be used on the main thoroughfares, where they are now using the whole 100 percent, and will compel them to use 25 percent on rural mail routes and school-bus routes. The main-thoroughfare advocates should be satisfied with this. In fact, I feel that this money should be divided 50-50. That would be a more fair division. But, out of respect for the former division, I have made it 25 percent in this bill.

There are many arguments that I can advance for the passage of this bill. I know that every Congressman here this afternoon has many arguments that he can advance. I will not consume your time in advancing any arguments except to say that 37 percent of our population lives outside of the cities, yet only 16 percent of the automobiles are owned by that 37 percent. The rural man has more use for an automobile than does the city man, but the city man owns the automobile largely for pleasure, while the rural man cannot even operate an automobile, which he needs very badly in his business. Marketing his product and educating his children are more important to the rural man than is the producing of his crop. It is also very important to the city man that the rural man can bring his products to the consumer in the city. This bill should pass; and if it does, it would be a piece of permanent legislation which is fair. If it fails, then the rural man will be served a great injustice. The same fair-mindedness shown by a large majority of the House in passing the amendment offered by me in the last session of Congress will, I am sure, manifest itself again when the occasion presents.

The other bill which I introduced has the same purpose in view. It differs from the first bill in that it is temporary in its nature. It is intended to operate only for 3 years. The following is a copy of it:

Joint resolution providing for improvement of rural roads

Whereas there is much unemployment throughout all parts of the United States; and

Whereas the construction and repair of public roads is one of the best methods of relieving unemployment; and

Whereas there are yet many miles of unimproved roads on which rural free-delivery mail routes, star mail routes, and public-school bus routes operate: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of increasing employment and for the purpose of improving the Postal Service and the educational advantages of the youth of the Nation there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the following sums: $150,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936; $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937; and $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938.

Such sums shall be apportioned among the several States, seven-eighths in accordance with the provisions of section 21 of the Federal Highway Act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented (which act is hereby further amended for the purposes of this title to include the District of Columbia), and one-eighth in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of the United States according to the latest decennial census. And said sums shall be expended only on rural free-delivery mail routes, star mail routes, and public-school bus routes.

And no part shall be expended or used on a highway or road which has been designated as a part of a Federal or State highway system and eligible to participation in Federal aid for roads constructed as primary or secondary roads or routes.

No part of the funds appropriated hereunder to any State need be matched by funds from that State.

The specifications and plans for the roads and highways constructed or improved by the appropriations herein provided for shall be prepared by such agencies as the Postmaster General and the Secretary of Agriculture shall designate and shall meet the approval of said Postmaster General and Secretary of Agriculture.

The amount apportioned hereunder to each of the several States shall be allocated to the various counties of that State in the ratio that the total of the rural free-delivery mail routes, the star mail routes, and the public-school bus routes operating in any county on roads not a part of a Federal or State highway system, either primary or secondary, bears to the total rural free-delivery routes, star mail routes, and public-school bus routes operating in the whole State on roads not a part of the Federal or State highway system, either primary or secondary.

The selection of the highways and roads to be constructed or improved in any county of any State is to be left to the county commissioners of that county. The supervision of the construction or improvement is to be left to such agencies as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may select.

This bill provides specifically that the money appropriated thereunder must be spent on rural roads. It cannot be spent on these great thoroughfares which in many cases have been built where there is not half as much traffic as is carried on many dirt roads in many sections of the United States. It is reliably estimated that there are 59,000 miles of heavily constructed roads in the United States in excess of the needs for the same. These unnecessary miles have cost more than $600,000,000. We have gone to extremes in this respect. We cannot go to extremes in the other direction so long as there are thousands upon thousands of rural people who are bound to their homes several months of the year because of bad roads. If this bill should pass, the local road authorities could then be free to extend their efforts farther into the rural sections to the benefit of those who are the most helpless now.

This bill proposes a division of authority in determining the location of the roads to be improved. It gives the county commissioners a chance to have some authority. The commissioners are elected by the people and know the wants of the rural people. The Government will, under this bill, furnish the money and provide the plans and specifications and provide the supervision and machinery, but the higher authorities will not have the full power. The rural people themselves through their county commissioners will have to be consulted.

Either or both of these bills will be of great benefit to the rural man who now is in the mud. If I can help bring him relief, I shall feel amply repaid for the efforts that I have expended through the years. If these bills or similar bills should not pass, I will still keep fighting on, for there is no question but that our cause is right and just. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, in which I shall continue this valuable discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, many Congressmen at this session as well as the last session introduced old-age pension bills. At the last session of Congress I introduced one and made the age limit 50 years.

I maintain that the time has come when we should provide a pension for every man and woman who has attained the age of 50 and who is out of employment. It is an absolute fact that in practically every industry in the United States, when a man or a woman applies for a job, and they have reached the age of 50, they cannot secure employment. And it is also true that in many departments of the Government a man who has reached the age of 50 cannot obtain a position.

What are we going to do with these men and women?

It is my candid opinion that it would be more economical and humane to give a pension to all those who have attained the age of 50 rather than have them compelled to join the breadline and go into poorhouses. We know most of the money that is appropriated for the maintenance of poorhouses is spent for overhead expenses. So, ladies and gentlemen, I will introduce a bill and ask you to support it, and I am going to make the age limit 50 years. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, for many years the question of the Government competing with private business has been an issue in both Houses of Congress and also discussed on the floor of this House. Both political parties, from time to time, have included planks in their platforms pledging to eliminate Government competition with private industry.

In the last Congress a bill was introduced which provided for the setting up of a cost-accounting system. That bill was referred to the committee of which I am chairman. Propaganda, the like of which you never saw, soon appeared in support of the legislation. The bill was introduced in the closing days of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress. When the second session met, the committee held hearings upon the bill. Even while the committee was holding hearings I was receiving telegrams saying that the committee was not giving a fair opportunity to those who favored the bill to be heard. Testimony of the various Government agencies showed that if the bill were enacted into law as introduced it would cost the Government millions of dollars to enforce it, and there would be no benefit as a result. The Comptroller General favored the bill in part, but told me personally, in view of conditions, this was a bad time to pass it.

In the last issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Seventy-third Congress, which was published probably 2 weeks after we adjourned, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON], author of the bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], a member of my committee, both assailed me because that bill did not get out of the committee. Of course, I had no opportunity to answer them.

I am chairman of the committee, but I have only one vote in the committee. I opposed the bill as introduced and would oppose a similar bill now. It so happened, however, after the hearings were concluded, that it was agreed that an effort should be made to get together with the Comptroller General, some officials of the various departments who were opposed to the original bill, and those who favored the bill, to see if some legislation could not be drawn up that might be beneficial and at the same time not cost the Government millions of dollars to install. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] came to me and asked me to please delay any action on the bill until he had an opportunity to go to Pennsylvania and attend the marriage of his niece. He went away, and as the RECORD will show, he was absent from this House on roll call after roll call in the closing days of the session, and he never did come back to me and ask me to take any action; and I kept my word with him and let the matter rest.

Mr. Chairman, another bill was introduced the other day. I have not had time to read it. It may be the same bill. However, some of the departments have called up and asked me to let them be heard in the event the bill is taken up, one saying that it is more drastic than the original bill. As I said, I have not looked at the bill and have no idea of its provisions.

I am just as much in favor as any man in the House of stopping Government competition with private industry. I want to say now what I have often said, you can pass all the legislation that you desire with reference to cost-accounting systems and you will never stop the Government competing with private industry until the Members of this House and the Senate stop appropriating money and legislation making it mandatory for the departments to compete with private industry. Cost-accounting systems will not stop it when you compel by legislation the departments to manufacture their own supplies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, the RECORD will show that I have attempted on the floor of this House through amendment to stop the Government competing with private industry on numerous occasions.

We spent over $15,000 for a special committee to go around the country to investigate what the Government was doing as far as competition with private industry is concerned. That committee held hearings in all parts of the country. One of the most flagrant competitors of private industry was an Army factory in Philadelphia. A few years ago, when the Army appropriation bill was pending, I exercised my right and offered an amendment placing a limitation upon the money appropriated therein, which limitation would have closed that factory in Philadelphia.

This very factory, according to the special investigating committee, manufactures nearly 100 articles that the Government can purchase in the open market. My amendment was carried, though somewhat modified, and if it had become a law the factory would have closed up. I was appealed to by Members in this House to withdraw the amendment. I refused. The bill went to the other side of the Capitol, and a Senator from Pennsylvania, who is no longer in that body, held up the bill for weeks and weeks until he finally succeeded in getting my amendment modified so that the factory could carry on. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], from the State where the factory was located, a member of the committee of which I am the chairman, also a member of the special investigating committee, who criticized me, offered me no assistance in taking that factory out of competition with private business.

The Holman rule gives one an opportunity to offer amendments placing limitations upon appropriation bills. The bill before us at the present time is the second appropriation bill. An amendment will stand on this bill or any other appropriation bill under the Holman rule limiting the expenditure of money appropriated in the bill. In this bill one can prevent the District of Columbia from competing with private industry, if you know it is competing, by drawing the proper amendment. So it is with every appropriation bill that we will consider in this House. Here is the place to take the Government out of business and this is the only way it can be done.

When the Army appropriation bill comes to this floor, I am going to prepare and offer the amendment which I offered several years ago and I shall notify the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] that I am going to do it and give him, if he desires, the amendment, so that he can offer it. If he does, I shall support him on the floor. He was a member of the committee that spent this money to investigate the Government competition with private industry, which is making so much noise now about Government's competing with private industry, and his special committee said this factory in his State was the outstanding offender. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] does not desire to offer the amendment which will stop that factory in his State from competing with private industry, then I shall offer it myself, but I shall expect the gentleman to support the amendment by both voice and vote on the floor of this House.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I am interested in the gentleman's statement about the Government's engaging in private industry. I am in entire accord with the gentleman's statement. The gentleman is Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and can play a very important part in keeping the Government out of business, because he has a right to review all these expenditures. Along this line, does not the gentleman think it is very much easier for the Government to get into business when we make lump-sum appropriations?

Mr. COCHRAN. I agree with the gentleman that lump-sum appropriations can cause a great deal of damage. Those administering lump-sum appropriations can put the Government in business and do what they desire. There is no checking them, as the minority leader knows.

But in emergencies it is necessary at times to give to the President, as we gave to your Republican President, lump sums and also the power to exercise his judgment in spending the money. I think that in time of an emergency, no matter whether the President be a Democrat or a Republican, there is justification for passing such legislation, but only when an emergency exists.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has expired.

Mr. DITTER. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. In times of extreme emergency I agree with the gentleman, but how long does the gentleman consider that these emergencies exist?

Mr. COCHRAN. If the gentleman does not know that the emergency which we inherited from the last Republican administration still exists, I think he is out of touch with conditions in the country. I am sure the gentleman is too well informed not to know it.

Mr. SNELL. I would say that perhaps some emergencies still exist, but the emergencies calling for huge lump-sum appropriations, from my understanding of conditions throughout the country, certainly do not exist at the present time, so that it is necessary to give these appropriations for 2 years in advance.

Mr. COCHRAN. I repeat, the emergency which the present President of the United States inherited from the previous President of the United States to a great extent still exists, and nobody can deny that it exists. I will not attempt to deny it, for I know it still exists.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York seeks to take me away from expressing my thought on the Government's competing with business. I want to say again that if any Member has any factories or arsenals or navy yards or any other Government activity in his district he wants to stop, do not ask the Congress to pass bills creating a new accounting system that will cost millions to operate, but let him come here when the appropriation bill is being considered and place a limitation upon the appropriation bill which will prohibit the spending of any money to operate the factory, and the factory will be closed.

In the Navy Department appropriation bill every year we make provision that compels the Navy Department to manufacture its own supplies when it can do it cheaper than it can purchase supplies in the open market. Everyone who has been here in past Congresses has voted for the Navy Department appropriation bill and for that clause in the bill, and it cannot be eliminated on a point of order, because it is law.

Personally I am not in favor of closing our navy yards and arsenals; they are necessary from a national-defense standpoint. But there is much competition with private industry which can be done away with. You can stop it only in one way—stop appropriating money that makes it mandatory upon the various departments to compete with private industry.

Mr. DARROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. DARROW. Does not the gentleman from Missouri think there is a distinction between the question of national defense and other kinds of industry?

Mr. COCHRAN. Absolutely; when it comes to munitions of ordnance or navy yards, I do; but let me ask the gentleman a question: Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania approve of what the factory in Philadelphia was doing, as outlined in the report filed by the subcommittee that investigated the Government's competing with private industry?

Mr. DARROW. The quartermaster's factory, I think, is doing good work ordinarily.

Mr. COCHRAN. But I should like to know if the gentleman approves of the report made by his colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

Mr. DARROW. No; I do not, entirely.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, during the past few days there has been some increased interest and discussion with reference to the so-called "bonus legislation." For the past few years when we talked about the bonus bill it was generally understood that we were referring to the Patman bill, H. R. 1, the bill which provides for the immediate and full payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates, and which provides that this money shall be made available through the issuance of new currency, and that no bond issue or levy of taxes would be necessary to pay off this obligation to World War veterans.

When we have talked about the bonus in the past few years it has generally been regarded throughout the country that we were talking about the Patman bill. I want to call that to your attention particularly in view of the fact that within the last few days another bill has been introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], which is generally known as the "American Legion plan" for the payment of the bonus. I want to call to your attention the fact that there is a very great difference between the provisions of those two bills, with reference to the method of making the money available for the purpose of paying this obligation. The Vinson bill provides merely an authorization of an appropriation, so that under the terms of that bill the money will be made available in the usual way, which will be through the issuance of bonds, the levying of taxes, the issuance of more tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds.

This is a question in which many groups of people other than veterans have been interested. The bonus question can no longer be considered a veterans' problem, because other groups have been very much interested in the provisions of the Patman bill. The National Farmers Union, for instance, and other farm organizations, have gone on record at national conventions for the last 3 or 4 years, favoring the payment of the bonus to the veterans; but I want to call to your attention the fact that at the same time the National Farmers Union passed a resolution urging the payment of the bonus, in the same convention they passed resolutions condemning the practice of issuing interest-bearing, tax-exempt securities, showing very definitely that the farm groups who have supported this legislation have done so because they have been advocating an expansion of the currency. They have been opposed to the issuance of tax-exempt securities.

I wish to say further that there has been an effort on the part of some veterans' organizations to propagandize this particular proposal, and in each instance the leaders of this proposal to pay the bonus have advocated the retirement of that obligation through the issuance of new currency and not through the issuance of tax-exempt securities.

So I want to call your attention to the fact that you are confronted with the question of satisfying groups other than the veterans with reference to this legislation. To illustrate, if you were to pass the Vinson bill you would not be meeting the demands of the farm leaders, who are asking for an expansion of the currency. Bear in mind, too, the fact that certain groups who have been vitally interested in monetary reform, "inflationists", as some people call them, and I consider myself one of this class, although I prefer to be called a "reflationist" rather than an inflationist; but, be that as it may, certain groups have been sponsoring the payment of the bonus not because they particularly wanted to pay it to the veterans but because they felt it was the ideal method of distributing a sufficient amount of circulating currency to meet the normal business demands of the Nation. So if you favor the Vinson bill, you will not be complying with the demand of this group; and I want to say that you will have a very difficult time justifying your position, excepting only with the veterans of the Nation.

A few years ago Congress provided that the veterans should be permitted to borrow 50 percent of the full face value of their certificates. At that time most of the veterans took advantage of this opportunity and borrowed as much as they were able to borrow on their certificates. This money went into the usual channels of trade. To some extent it certainly did stimulate business. It helped small retail men and large manufacturers alike. It helped all classes of business men.

It must be remembered, too, that there is a certain group of individuals who claim that the benefit derived at that time was infinitesimal, that it was not significant, that it did not really stimulate business to the extent that it could be considered wise economically from the standpoint of the general welfare of the Nation. I am not so sure of that. There may be some justification on the part of those who have some apprehension as to the real merit of the bill providing for payment of half of the bonus at that time. So far as the general welfare of the Nation is concerned I want to say that if you pass this Vinson bill you can give no more relief by paying the other half of the bonus than you gave when you paid the first half. Payment will do the same thing; it will do a tremendous amount of good; it will give the veterans an opportunity to reestablish their credit. No doubt most of this money will leave the hands of the veterans and go into the hands of those who can use the money advantageously in establishing their own credit or extinguishing debt. I believe it would have a wholesome effect upon the Nation; but you cannot expect any more benefit under the Vinson bill than was given under the bill which provided for the payment of the first half of the bonus.

On the other hand, if you pass the Patman bill and thereby put into circulation over $2,000,000,000 of new currency, you will materially increase the price level of all commodities. Bear in mind that the Patman bill has a very definite check against unduly increasing the price level, so there is no danger of increasing prices above the 1926 level, which is the objective of the monetary reformers. It is the objective of those who have been and still are sponsoring the Patman bill.

The issuance of this new currency would put an additional amount of currency in circulation and would to some extent at least cheapen the value of the dollar. We hope it will cheapen the value of the dollar to where it was in 1926. As I say, the bill has a perfect check and control, so that there is no possibility of the bill's operating to increase prices above the 1926 level.

The Vinson bill apparently anticipates merely authorizing an appropriation, which means the Government will sell bonds, take this money out of circulation, put it in the Treasury, and pay it right out to the veterans. So, after the operation is completed, there will not be one additional dollar of currency in circulation, because that bill would take the money out of circulation and then put it back into circulation by paying it to the veterans; but if we expand the currency as is provided in the Patman bill we will increase the currency in circulation and it will have a wholesome effect upon the entire country. After the provisions of the bill have been put into operation there will be an additional amount of circulating medium, an additional amount of currency with which to carry on the normal business activities of the Nation.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Are the Veterans of Foreign Wars opposed to the Vinson bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. I am not prepared to state that the Veterans of Foreign Wars are opposed to the Vinson bill, but I am prepared to say that the Veterans of Foreign Wars for several years have been advocating the enactment of the Patman bill. On several occasions at the request of the national headquarters of the Veterans of Foreign Wars I have had the opportunity of speaking to the veterans, and on those occasions I, as well as other advocates of the plan whom I have heard speak, advocated the payment of the bonus through an expansion of the currency and not through a bond issue.

Yesterday, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], spoke at some length against the policy of issuing tax-exempt securities. I agree fully with his remarks with reference to this particular subject. I believe the great majority of the Membership of the House will be glad to see a start made against a continuation of this policy of issuing tax-exempt securities. If we pass the Vinson bill it will mean that we will have more tax-exempt securities in existence because the bill merely authorizes an appropriation and, automatically, the money will be made available through the issuance of bonds, and these bonds will be tax exempt.

I submit that there is every reason at this time to pass the Patman bill. In the first place, you will remember that when this bill was first advocated the opponents raised their hands in horror and said: "Why, if you pass this bill you will drive us off the gold standard." We do not have to worry about that any more. That has all been taken care of and, I believe, in a very nice way. I believe the country is immeasurably better off since we went off the gold standard. So that argument is no longer available to be used in opposition to the Patman bill.

They also stated: "If you issue that currency under the provisions of the Patman bill, you will be issuing fiat money", and they talked about the horrors and the terrible consequences of running the printing presses. If I have any conception of the meaning of "fiat money", it is money behind which there is not a sufficient metallic reserve. I do not claim to be a monetary expert, but I feel that I have given the matter as much consideration as the average Member of this House, and, although my acquaintance with the subject does not permit me to use the finest technical terms perhaps, it seems to me like good common sense to say that the issuance of $2,000,000,000 of additional currency would not by any stretch of the imagination give us fiat money.

According to the figures of the United States Treasury, on the 1st of December last we had in excess of $8,000,000,000 in gold in the Treasury. I assume the figures have not changed materially since. Also on that date we had $1,200,000,000 worth of silver. We had a total amount of gold and silver of $9,400,000,000 with just slightly over five and a half billion dollars of currency in circulation. Mr. Chairman, we could issue close to $4,000,000,000 more of currency and still have 100 cents of metal back of every dollar of currency outstanding; so that no one can make the claim now that the issuance of this currency will be fiat money. If they still use this argument, their conception of the term "fiat money" is far different from mine.

Why, under our old system when we were going along nicely a few years ago, we always considered that 40 percent gold reserve was adequate. As a matter of fact, under our statutory law we provide that 40 percent in gold is sufficient backing to the currency in circulation. So that if we ignore the silver which we have, and which should not be done, and just say that we have a little over $8,000,000,000 in gold back of the five and a half billion dollars in currency, it is very easy to understand that we now have, roughly speaking, 150 cents worth of gold back of every dollar of currency outstanding; and if we issue the $2,000,000,000 of additional currency, we will still have much more than 100 cents of gold back of every dollar of currency outstanding.

This money cannot be discriminated against. True, it would be paper money, but under the Gold Standard Act all paper money issued by the United States Government and the Federal reserve is redeemable in gold. That is the basic law, so that if at a time when people could redeem their paper money with gold, a reserve of 40 percent gold was sufficient to back up the currency, it seems to me that 150 percent ought to be adequate security or an adequate reserve back of your currency when you cannot get the gold if you did surrender your circulating medium.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. So that if 40 percent was sufficient at one time, it seems to me that now one should be permitted to say we have fiat money when we have $1.60 of gold or metallic base, including silver, back of every dollar of currency outstanding, and this at a time when you cannot redeem the currency outstanding in gold. We have an adequate amount of gold in reserve for the issuance of this currency, and so long as the crying need of the Nation is to expand the currency, I say that we should use the Patman plan rather than the Vinson plan for the payment of our obligations to the veterans. May I remind you again of the fact that the payment of the bonus under the Vinson plan may satisfy some veterans, but it is not going to satisfy all of them, because the great majority of the veterans are sold on the payment of this bonus because they believe that it will help the entire country, not only themselves. [Applause.]

They are not a selfish lot. I submit, Mr. Chairman, payment of this bonus under the provisions of the Patman plan rather than under the Vinson plan would give an immeasurable amount of relief to this country.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. How much does the gentleman feel the currency should be expanded?

Mr. BOILEAU. May I say to the gentleman that I do not claim to know how much it should necessarily be expanded, but at least enough to bring back the price level of 1926. I say we should bring the price level back to the average of 1926, and I believe the $2,000,000,000 will about do the trick. If it raises prices too high, then there are provisions in the Patman bill for the withdrawal of currency and putting bonds in circulation in lieu thereof.

Mr. MICHENER. There are many Members of the House who are interested in another expansion bill, namely, the Lemke bill. If the Lemke bill is enacted into law, that would bring about an expansion of about what?

Mr. BOILEAU. That bill provides that there shall not be in excess of $75 per capita in circulation. I am just quoting from memory. That is an expansion of three or four billion dollars.

Mr. MICHENER. If that bill creates an expansion of three or four billion dollars, and if it should take eight to ten billion dollars to take care of the farm indebtedness of the country, and if we add on this additional $2,200,000,000 are we not going to go further into the expansion business than the gentleman himself or the country at large might prefer?

Mr. BOILEAU. I may say to the gentleman that the $8,000,000,000 that the gentleman refers to does represent the farm debt, but no one who advocates the passage of the Frazier bill will ask that we print that much currency.

We ask that about $3,000,000,000 be used for the purpose of creating a revolving fund to refinance these obligations and the bill has a definite check of $75 per capita of currency in circulation.

Mr. MICHENER. But we would have to borrow that money, if we stopped after we expanded to the extent of $75 per capita.

Mr. BOILEAU. We create a revolving fund of about $3,000,000,000.

Mr. MICHENER. The thing I was trying to bring to the gentleman's attention is this: If we are in favor of the payment of the bonus in the way the gentleman has suggested, and if we are in favor of the Lemke bill, it seems to me that before we commence to expand in a given direction, we should have all of our expansion pictured, and determine whether or not we are going for the Lemke bill or whether we are going for the Patman bill or whether we are going the full length of inflation.

Mr. BOILEAU. I understand the gentleman's point quite well, and let me reply in this manner: Every inflationist I know of favors the Frazier-Lemke bill, the bonus, and these other bills in principle, but no one that I know of would advocate the enactment of all these bills at the same time. No one advocates and no one has advocated the enactment of bills that would give the greatest possible amount of expansion of the currency. The proponents of the Frazier-Lemke bill, in saying that about $3,000,000,000 would be sufficient to use as a revolving fund, mean that we should stop at that point if commodity prices get to the 1926 level; and then I may say to the gentleman that if we passed that measure first, and that had the desired effect, then I would be willing to accept the Vinson plan, rather than the Patman plan, but we have not passed the Frazier-Lemke bill yet, and with the temper of this House as I have seen it during the past 4 years I am not so sure that we can pass the Frazier-Lemke bill so easily.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. For one, I would not want both passed at the same time. If one of them were passed, then I would accept, so far as I am concerned, a compromise in the matter and provide that the other money be made available in some other method, at least until we had an opportunity to observe the results of the enactment of the first bill passed.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is reaching the very point in which I am interested. It is practically impossible to carry out the views of the proponents of the Frazier-Lemke bill and the views of the Patman proponents and pass the same bills at the same session of Congress.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman is probably correct, but the gentleman is also much more of an optimist than I am if he feels that Congress is going to pass them both one after the other without intervening time. I should be very optimistic if I thought we could pass one early in this session and then pass the other one later during the session.

Mr. MICHENER. There are a great many people in this body in favor of the so-called "Townsend plan." Would the gentleman favor the Townsend plan to the exclusion of either or both of the other measures?

Mr. BOILEAU. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan that unless the bonus bill is passed or unless the Frazier-Lemke bill is passed or unless some other inflationary measure is passed, and passed soon, you are going to see a much greater demand for the Townsend bill than that which now exists. I am very frank to say to the gentleman that I believe the Townsend plan to be the most inflationary measure yet suggested. I doubt very much if it would be possible to enact the Townsend plan with its sales-tax provision and retain any of our present conceptions of economics. I do, however, favor a liberal and adequate old-age pension system. I should like to say to the gentleman that I believe, however, unless some inflationary measure is enacted, you are going to have to go as far as the Townsend plan. You are going to have to give some inflation to the country so that the people will have a fair chance to at least eke out an existence.

Mr. MICHENER. I assume the gentleman is receiving mail as I do, coming from certain groups, advocating the enactment of the Patman bill, the Townsend bill, and the Lemke bill. The gentleman has made it very clear that in his judgment it would be ruinous to enact any two of them in the same session of the Congress.

Mr. BOILEAU. I should not want to say it would be ruinous to enact the Frazier-Lemke bill and the bonus in the same session of Congress. I do say, however, it might be very dangerous. However, I do not want to say that $2,000,000,000 or $3,000,000,000 is a sufficient amount to expand the currency. Maybe that is not going to be enough, and I do say that we should use such bills to expand the currency until the commodity price level reaches the 1926 level, and we should start with one or the other of them right now.

Mr. MICHENER. I have a great many farmers in my district, as the gentleman has. Does the gentleman think it would be better first to pass the Lemke bill to take care of the farmers or to pass the Patman bill first?

Mr. BOILEAU. I wish to say to the gentleman that since I have been a Member of the Congress I have been one of the exponents of the Frazier-Lemke bill. I want to say to you here now that if I had my choice today to enact any one piece of legislation which I thought would do the greatest amount of good for all the people, I would cast my vote for the Frazier-Lemke bill. I believe it to be economically sound in principle, I believe it to be workable and helpful to every man, woman, and child in this country. However, I may say that I am not willing to carry all my eggs in one basket. I am going to keep on working for inflation just as I have at every session for the last 4 years, because I believe we are not going to get out of the depression until we expand our currency materially; and if the gentleman from Michigan, or any other gentleman, has any real, sensible program of expansion—I mean one that appeals to me as being sensible—I can assure the gentleman I shall support it and do all I can to have it enacted if it appears to me to be the one that will first receive consideration.

However, I want to leave this statement with the Membership of the House. I believe in expansion of the currency. I am going to keep on fighting for it to the utmost of my ability, and I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that it is going to be a sorry day for this country unless we wake up in the near future and have the Congress of the United States have something to say about our monetary system.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under the Patman plan the veteran himself, about whom we are concerned in the payment of the bonus, will receive a cheaper dollar?

Mr. BOILEAU. No; not a cheaper dollar than anybody else gets.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman——

Mr. BOILEAU. Just a moment. I do not want to accept a wrong premise in this argument. The gentleman made the statement, "the veteran, about whom we are chiefly concerned." That is not my position. I believe this is a matter in which every citizen of the country is concerned. It is not only a veterans' problem but it is one of national economics and one in which the entire Nation is interested.

Mr. KENNEY. That is, the inflationary part?

Mr. BOILEAU. Both parts of it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. KENNEY. Under the Vinson plan would not the veterans get a greater value than under the Patman bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes; at the expense of every other person in this country.

Mr. KENNEY. Does it not occur to the gentleman that in connection with the bonus legislation we might pass the Vinson bill without any burden on the taxpayer whatever, and at the same time not give rise to any fear of inflation, provided we passed a revenue-raising measure at the same time which would not resort to or burden the taxpayer, and we could do that through my proposed national lottery?

Mr. BOILEAU. I thought the gentleman would come around to the lottery. [Laughter.] I know the gentleman is a serious sponsor for that proposition, but I do not think I can support a lottery.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman know of any other plan better or equally as good that would raise money without being a great burden on the taxpayer?

Mr. BOILEAU. I am sorry if I have not been able to make my views plain on expansion of the currency. It would not be a burden on the taxpayer, but it would be of benefit to each and every one of them; only some of them do not want to lose the unfair advantage they have because of our silly monetary system. Now, I do not care to discuss the lottery proposition. The gentleman made reference to the fear of inflation. I am not one of those who is fearful of inflation, because it can be controlled by a sensible Congress. I believe there are men in this House who believe in moderate expansion who would cooperate with the conservative men in the House to prevent undue expansion.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if the money to support this lottery comes out of those who are able to support it?

Mr. BOILEAU. I will let the gentleman from New Jersey answer that question.

Mr. KENNEY. It comes by voluntary contribution of the people. It is a voluntary tax. It is not a compulsory tax. If a man does not want to participate in it, he need not do so. I believe that we ought to go to the country to raise this money from people who are willing to contribute small amounts to support various worthy causes, as they did in the Revolutionary War and thereafter and as they are now doing in supporting foreign hospitals, foreign veterans, and other foreign causes through participation in lotteries of other countries.

Mr. WHITE. The losses through gambling at race tracks would be a similar contribution.

Mr. KENNEY. Oh, no; that is an entirely different principle. The proceeds go into different channels entirely.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I want to conclude my statement and make it well understood that I am not advocating a lottery as a means of paying the bonus. The Vinson bill is bad enough. When it comes to expansion of the currency, there is no gambling about it. If gentlemen will study the provisions of the Patman bill, they will find it provides for a controlled expansion of the currency, and in my opinion there is no one thing that would be of as much benefit to the country as to expand the currency moderately as provided in the Patman bill. And I say as much for the Frazier-Lemke bill, so that I would not be charged with deserting my first love, because I do advocate the Frazier-Lemke bill as a bill to give much-needed relief to agriculture. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to direct attention to the necessity of some immediate action by Congress for the relief of the home owners. The situation became tragic in November when it was announced that no further applications for home loans would be received and that no application had a chance for favorable consideration unless it had reached the closing department. Unless some attention is given to this situation and some provision made to accomplish and complete the real purpose of the home owners' loan movement, a complete break-down of this phase of the recovery program must be admitted.

As of January 3, the Corporation has closed a total of 733,140 loans, in the amount of $2,219,011,290. There are in the closing department a total of 188,696, thus making a total of 921,836 loans which will have been closed with the money previously appropriated by Congress for that purpose.

In New Jersey the Corporation has closed as of the same date 29,824 loans, involving $145,714,727. There are in the legal department being closed an additional 6,585 loans, which would make a total of 36,409 closed under the present appropriation. The ones actually closed as of January 3 represent 50.3 percent of the net applications.

There has been considerable criticism in Congress of the administrative officers of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. There may have been errors of omission and commission in the administration of the act, but it is also true that the program has accomplished a great deal of good. We cannot hope to make legislation effective without the faith and confidence of the people. Ridicule and caustic criticism by those who enact the laws do not conduce to that faith and confidence. It behooves us, therefore, to extol its virtues and correct its shortcomings, and with the knowledge that has come to us from the experiences of the past 2 years, meet the situation and complete the job by granting the home owners the relief it was intended they should have.

Operations of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation were suspended on November 16, 1934. Congress has been in session since January 3. If I judge the sentiment of the House correctly, there is sufficient support for an additional appropriation and for such action as may be necessary to grant this relief, and Members are waiting for an opportunity to support the necessary legislation for that purpose. But there is no indication of anything being done. When the legislation was being considered by the House, the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Insurance very frankly said it was not the hope or idea of the proponents of the legislation that it would be a complete solution for all the difficulties confronting the home owners, that it was experimental in its nature, and it was the hope it would grant some relief and blaze the way to a solution of these difficulties. Whether or not it is wise within the purview of constitutional limitations, or economically sound, for the Government to enter into this activity is doubtful, but we have been constrained to overlook these considerations because of the emergencies which exist, and also for the reason that this was one of the emergency-relief measures which is self-liquidating, and which provides reasonable certainty for the Government to get back a considerable portion of the money which it invests and will enable it to retire from this sort of activity in that great day we all hope for when conditions shall have righted themselves.

For these reasons I was glad to support the legislation as a part of the recovery program, and I have watched its course with considerable interest. I lent my cooperation to every agency in my district, in public addresses, and in private conversation to bring about its successful operation, and this, notwithstanding that I was not asked to recommend a single individual as an appraiser or as an attorney, and that the entire organization in my State bears every indication of the fact that one who sought employment with the corporation, as a condition precedent to his qualifications, needed to be affiliated with the political activities of the party in power.

It may be true, as is charged, that many applications failed of proper consideration because of the inefficiency of the administrative officers. It may be true that favoritism was shown in some instances, and it may be true, and doubtless is, that many persons obtained loans who were not in difficulties, whose properties did not need refinancing, and who could have solved their problems in other ways. All these shortcomings might readily be the natural and probable consequences of the haste with which the organization was set up and the inexperience of the administrative officers. Newness and haste always create evils of one kind or another. Also, in the discharge of their duties the administrative officers met many situations, and the necessary resistance on their part in improper and unworthy cases naturally caused resentment and adverse comment. However, the way to solve this difficult problem is not by adding to this criticism and the lack of confidence which it will inevitably create by yapping about conditions, but it is for the responsible parties to undertake the study of the exigencies, and the situation of home owners as it exists today and to find a solution for it, and in this instance the responsibility lies with the Congress of the United States, and should have immediate attention.

Knowing of the charges and attacks that are being made and the necessitous conditions confronting thousands of home owners, it should be the obligation of the Committee to immediately undertake an investigation into the matter and determine upon the procedure and future policy of the Government.

Encouraged by the hope held out to them 2 years ago, many home owners have been anticipating favorable action, and people who have their money invested in mortgages have been awaiting action by the Government. Meanwhile, interest on mortgages, municipal taxes, and Government charges against the property, insurance premiums, and the cost of necessary repairs have been accruing, further jeopardizing investments and making it more difficult for home owners to solve their problems. This experiment, which was one of many calculated to bring about economic recovery, has taught us many valuable lessons from which it should be possible for Congress to overcome many shortcomings. The administrative officers have learned the same lessons and, in many instances, have used their knowledge to the end that the appropriation made by Congress and the bonds issued may be placed in channels where it was really intended they should go.

There is no doubt that mortgage companies, building and loan associations, and banks and individuals have benefited by an exchange of bonds for mortgages, and many municipalities have been relieved by the payment of taxes brought about through the payments which have been made through the refinancing of homes under the act.

We hear much of the effort to force private money out of hiding into investments. In my judgment none of the other efforts to induce investment in real-estate mortgages will be as effective as the system provided under the Home Owners' Loan Act. The bonds are finding a ready market, and the relief from anxiety of the home owner is a reassurance, and he has undertaken the task of meeting the vicissitudes of life, even under existing conditions, with greater hope, greater faith, and greater confidence.

I have said that the situation now existing among the home owners is tragic. Hope deferred has resulted in discouragement and disaster. It is the obligation of Congress to hear this cry for action and to make the object of its immediate attention that vast concourse of Americans who have their all invested in their homes. I strongly urge that instead of indulging in ironical sarcasm and personal invectives and criticism of public officials, which can have no other purpose than to hamper the work of the agencies of the Government and destroy the faith and confidence of the public in governmental agencies, we should look to a solution which the public has a right to expect. Our duty is plain. We should either go forward and finish the job of granting relief to home owners, either by the method provided by the Home Owners' Loan Act, or some substitute therefor; or else we should stop encouraging those who have been led to believe that their Government was coming to their aid, and make it known that the effort to aid home owners has been abandoned so that they will not continue to dwell on false hopes and will face the inevitable.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill down to and including line 15, page 30.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3973, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCDUFFIE, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. DUNN of Mississippi, for 4 days, on account of important business.

RIVERS AND HARBORS OF SOUTHWEST WASHINGTON AND THE NATIONAL HARBORS AND FLOOD CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein an address which I delivered before the Northwest Rivers and Harbors Congress at Seattle, Wash.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an address delivered by me before the Northwest Rivers and Harbors Congress at Seattle, Wash., on October 12, 1934.

The address is as follows:

Mr. President, members of the Northwest Rivers and Harbors Congress, ladies and gentlemen, I appreciate Mr. Wilson's kind words of introduction and I am glad that he is a little more charitable than the chairman on a certain occasion who was introducing a Member of Congress and said, "We have had a very profitable session and we are all enjoying ourselves. Shall we continue to do so, or shall I now call upon the Congressman to deliver his address?"

I am very happy to be here today and to have the opportunity of discussing with you matters in which I know you are all vitally interested, and which are also very close to my heart. I claim the unique distinction as a Member of Congress of representing more rivers and harbors and waterways and larger bodies of water than any other single Member of the United States Congress; and when I went back to the National Capital and sought membership on the Rivers and Harbors Committee I made that assertion and made it repeatedly and defied any other Member to successfully contradict it. In southwest Washington we have six very important harbors—Grays Harbor, Willapa Harbor, Longview, Vancouver, Olympia, and Bakers Bay. We have two important seaports—Longview and Vancouver—on the Columbia River, which is the tenth largest river in the world. Olympia is on Puget Sound, which is one of the largest inland bodies of water in the world. In addition to that I claim, and I believe, truthfully, that the Pacific Ocean, which is the largest ocean in the world, is in my district because Pacific Beach is in my district. In addressing the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in Chicago, I told them of the great honor and pleasure I had a number of years ago of being introduced to Mary Pickford, "America's sweetheart." I asked her if she had ever been in the State of Washington and she said she had spent some delightful hours in Seattle. I told her, "Well, you should by all means come down to Pacific Beach and visit our ocean down there. We are very proud of it. It is the largest ocean in the world." She smiled and said, "But isn't it the same one we have down here in California?" I had to admit that it was.

PROGRESS DURING PAST 2 YEARS

I think that there has been more development and more progress made in regard to rivers and harbors of the Northwest in the past 2 years than has been the case for a long time, and I believe that a great deal of the credit is due to your organization. I noted the fact that Mr. Wilson, in making his report, referred to your sponsorship by resolution of a number of very important projects which have since materialized and been carried out. I was just checking over the other day the number of items and transactions relating to the rivers and harbors of southwest Washington that came before the Rivers and Harbors Committee for action during the first and second sessions of the Seventy-third Congress, and I found that there are 20 items relating to hearings, reports adopted, resolutions that were passed, and other items of business relating to the rivers and harbors of southwest Washington.

GRAYS HARBOR JETTY PROJECT

Down on Grays Harbor we have succeeded in having transferred to the Federal Government the cost of maintaining the inner channel of Grays Harbor, which has been borne by the local taxpayers for 15 years, since 1919. I believe you mentioned in your report the Grays Harbor jetty. Since 1915, during the past 19 years, there has been no money appropriated in Congress for the Grays Harbor jetties, and during that period a program of dredging has been carried on. As a result, the jetties have become very badly in need of reconstruction. In fact, that condition has existed for the past 10 or 12 years, in regard to one of the jetties particularly, despite the efforts of our port commission and the port manager, Mr. W. J. Murphy, whom I want to say I consider as a very capable and competent gentleman in that position. He has been very aggressive, as has the port commission, and repeated efforts have been made to get the United States Board of Army Engineers to reverse its former adverse reports against reconstructing the Grays Harbor jetties. In September 1933 I introduced a resolution, after having had numerous conferences with members of the Board and the Chief of the United States Army Engineers, for a review of the former adverse reports. The resolution was duly passed by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, and in due time a review was made of the prior reports. Gen. George B. Pillsbury, first assistant to Maj. Gen. Edward M. Markham, came out here first, and at the time when he was inspecting the Willapa Harbor project he also investigated the condition of the jetties.

He went back to Washington and reported to the Board, and the Board came out and the entire personnel made a personal inspection and finally they reviewed all the evidence and the prior reports and rendered a decision recommending the project to reconstruct the north and south jetties of Grays Harbor to an elevation of 16 feet at a cost of $4,565,000, which would give us as safe and fine a harbor as there is anywhere in the United States, probably. That project is now pending before the Public Works Administration for allocation of funds, and I will bring it before the Rivers and Harbors Committee for adoption in the next Congress.

WILLAPA HARBOR AND VANCOUVER PROJECTS—OLYMPIA—BAKER'S BAY PROJECTS

The project to dredge Willapa Harbor to a depth of 26 feet was initiated and $80,000 of P. W. A. funds allocated for that purpose. In addition to that, we initiated the project to straighten the Narrows in the bend of the Willapa River, a very sharp S-turn in that river, which is a menace to navigation. That project will cost $207,000. It was favored by the district and division engineers, was rejected by the United States Board of Army Engineers, but was finally approved by General Markham, and the project is now pending before the Public Works Administration for funds. We obtained the necessary funds to carry out the Vancouver project to deepen the channel to a depth of 28 feet, but no sooner had that been done than it was found necessary to continue to a depth of 30 feet on account of the contemplated construction of a 2,000,000-bushel grain elevator which Colonel Robins and I had the delightful pleasure of helping to dedicate this summer. I want to just mention a little amusing experience when I was presenting the original project before the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House. We had a great many projects up that morning and I was speaking hurriedly, and, through a slip of the tongue, in referring to the grain terminal, I inadvertently described it several times as a 2,000,000-ton grain elevator. I noticed the chairman of the committee had a very peculiar expression on his face. He interrupted me and said, "Congressman SMITH, that certainly is a remarkable project. What was the name of that town?" "Why, Vancouver, Wash., at the head of the Columbia River", I answered. "Well," he said, "that certainly is a gigantic project, 2,000,000 tons. I don't believe we have very many that size in the United States." I realized what had occurred and told him I should have said 2,000,000 bushels. I was certainly impressing the committee with the importance and magnitude of my project. The modified project of 30 feet was approved by the engineers and is now before the Public Works Administration and will be brought before the Rivers and Harbors Committee for adoption when Congress convenes.

We have carried out a new project at Bakers Bay, to create a 10-foot channel at a total cost of $80,000. We deepened the Olympia Channel to a depth of 30 feet, and after that project was approved they found they did not have the funds for a turning basin, so we went back and got another resolution adopted and succeeded in getting the committee to authorize the additional funds, a total of $92.000, for carrying out the original project and providing the turning basin. We did not secure quite sufficient funds at Bakers Bay. We ran short of funds and had to go back and get an additional amount to complete the project down there, which we succeeded in obtaining.

HARBOR DREDGING IN SOUTHWEST WASHINGTON

For the first time in a long while we have the continuous operation of Government dredges in every seaport in southwestern Washington—Grays Harbor, Willapa Harbor, Longview, Bakers Bay, Olympia, and Vancouver. Dredging work has been done on the Washington ship canal. There has been work done at Tacoma Harbor and this work that we mentioned at Bellingham. We certainly ought to appreciate, and I think we do, the cooperation and the consideration we have received from Secretary Ickes and the Public Works Administration and the splendid cooperation we have had from the United States Board of Army Engineers, and particularly from Gen. Edward M. Markham, who has proved that he is very friendly to all the waterways of the Pacific Northwest. I believe he is a true friend of our section of the country and realizes the importance of our seaports out here. I consider that we are very fortunate indeed that the new north Pacific division office of the United States Board of Army Engineers has been established at Portland and has jurisdiction over all the harbors in our section of the country. That is going to be a decided advantage to us. I make the same statement in regard to Col. T. M. Robins, who has been very considerate, more than fair, and I believe he is our friend, and I am sure we all appreciate it.

NEW NATIONAL WATERWAYS PROGRAM

There is going to be a new national waterways program. You have read the message that President Roosevelt sent to Congress relating to that subject. It is going to be very comprehensive and embraces a great many features, among them flood control, river and harbor development, reforestation, and other national undertakings. We are more interested in the flood control and development of rivers and harbors. I understand it is contemplated to create 5 local boards similar to the Tennessee Valley Authority—1 for the Pacific coast, 1 for the Atlantic coast, 1 for the Gulf waterways, 1 board for the western tributaries, and 1 board for the western tributaries of the Mississippi River. This matter will come before Congress in January, based upon reports the engineers have been preparing. The report on the Columbia River is very voluminous and was just completed by Army Engineers last fall. I hope and I think it will be my position, as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, if I serve in the next Congress, that regardless of what set-up may be created that the jurisdiction and the supervision of all of this work be left in the hands of the United States Army Engineers. My friends, I have been interested in rivers and harbors for many years, long before I ever aspired to a seat in Congress, and I have read many reports of the Army Engineers, and I am more or less familiar with their work, and I think that their record for efficiency and for devotion to duty and integrity is hardly equaled, and certainly not surpassed, by any body of men who serve the Federal Government.

FLOOD CONTROL IS VERY IMPORTANT

The matter of flood control is very important. For the past 30 years we have had floods recurrently in this State every 2 or 3 years, some of them very disastrous. I recall particularly the flood which wiped out the old bridge between Kelso and Longview and did so much damage in 1923. The late Senator Wesley L. Jones was in Congress then and he had a great deal of influence in the Capital. He made every effort at that time to enlist the cooperation of the Federal Government and to get it to recognize that we had a flood-control problem in this State, but failed to do so. Down on Grays Harbor the most severe floods of record occurred in November 1909. Other floods came in December 1891, 1892, 1897, 1903; March 21, 1908; January 1914; December 21, 1915; 1919; and January 1923; in other words, floods have occurred at the rate of one every 4 years. The flood of 1897 cut a channel through a farm between Oakville and Porter and made travel by road difficult for almost 2 months. The flood of November 1909 washed out a 90-foot section of the right-of-way of the Northern Pacific Railroad between Montesano and Cosmopolis and submerged the rails in other places by 2½ feet.

The Federal Government has taken the position that as far as our flood-control problem in this State was concerned, it was a local problem for local communities. The Federal Government refused to render any aid. Last December, when we had the flood, it was the first time we ever succeeded in obtaining any financial aid from the Federal Government, and it was important, of course, because it resulted in a lot of repair work being done that was valuable and gave employment. But, in my opinion, it was more important because of the precedent it established. For the first time the Federal Government has recognized that we have a flood-control problem in this State as well as along the Mississippi River and the Sacramento River. As a result, we were able to secure the passage through Congress of bills for preliminary surveys of the main rivers and their tributaries in the States of Washington and Oregon. I introduced a bill relating to the Columbia River, which was amended to include Oregon. That survey is now being conducted. Similar bills were passed, favored by the Flood Control Committee of the House, signed by the President, and became the law of the land, for preliminary examinations of the Lewis, Cowlitz, and Chehalis Rivers, which will soon be made. These are the first bills for preliminary examinations in regard to flood control that have ever been passed by the United States Congress affecting the rivers in the State of Washington and in the State of Oregon; so, I feel, my friends, that we are making real progress. Now we are in the picture, and when this national program is carried out, which it will be in the very near future, as that legislation will come before Congress early in the next session, it is going to result in our obtaining protective measures in those States against floods in the future and against soil erosion. However, we cannot expect the Federal Government to assume the entire cost, as it has not done that along the Mississippi or Sacramento Rivers; but I think we will find in many communities that by constructing the dikes, by constructing tide boxes, by building roads and bridges, and making other improvements, we have already made a valuable contribution, and the Federal Government will more than match our expenditures. We are only beginning to recognize the truth of Theodore Roosevelt's prophecy of 30 years ago in regard to the need for flood control in this country. We have had these disastrous floods all over the country.

I happened to be in the office of Mr. Hopkins—Federal Emergency Relief Administrator—when he received a long-distance call from New York in regard to the floods up there. He had promised to help us out here and he turned the people of New York down because funds were not available. We have been treated very generously out in this section of the country in many ways, as witness the two great projects, the Bonneville project and the Grand Coulee project, to develop electrical power and for the reclamation of arid lands. I said that we have come into the picture. We have. We are receiving more attention from the Federal Government than has ever been true in the past. We can visualize a great industrial expansion in this part of the country. It is very essential that we be prepared by developing our rivers and harbors to protect the commerce that is going to enter and depart from the harbors of the State of Washington.

OMNIBUS RIVER-AND-HARBOR BILL

Speaking as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, I feel that I can honorably assure you that there will be a rivers and harbors bill reported out by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House and introduced in the next session of Congress and that it will be reported out and brought out on the floor of both of those bodies and will be enacted into law. We haven't had a river-and-harbor bill, I think, for 5 years. I don't believe there was a bill during the former administration, but we have the assurance of the present administration, of President Roosevelt himself, who has already proven his friendliness to river-and-harbor improvements, that he is friendly to such a bill being introduced and passed during the next session of Congress.

In conclusion, I want to acknowledge on this occasion my indebtedness to all the port managers in my district and throughout the State and to members of various port commissions for the splendid cooperation I have received from them and the magnificent way in which they have presented their projects, because we all realize no Congressman can get very far unless you gentlemen give him the material with which to work. You have to furnish us with the evidence and with the testimony, you might say, and then we have to conduct the case to the best of our ability. I also wish to pay a tribute to the district and division engineers, to Colonel Sturdevant, of Seattle, and Major Williams, of Portland, and, of course, as I have mentioned, to Colonel Robins, who is our true friend, although I don't believe he would allow his friendship to sway his judgment any more than I would, were you to present a project which I thought was fantastic and had no merit. I wouldn't sponsor it, because if a man did that he would lose his influence with the Rivers and Harbors Committee, as every time I appear before the committee I want to be fortified by facts and evidence, so that I can persuade them that the project is meritorious. That is where you gentlemen come in, in cooperating with port managers and district engineers in assembling facts and presenting the case.

I have a great deal of faith in the future of this part of the country. I think we are about to witness an awakening in the Orient; that the many millions over there are about to become modernized so that they will present the richest market for the sale of our products that the world has ever seen. Civilization has been moving westward ever since the dawn of creation. We are now about to witness the commercial supremacy of the Pacific coast, and I do not believe that any master of language could paint a word picture that would be too rosy so far as the future of the States of Washington and Oregon and all our seaports and all our cities in this section of the United States are concerned. We are on the eve of the greatest era of development that the world has ever witnessed.

I thank you for your kind attention.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] kindly inform us what the program is for tomorrow after the completion of the pending bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not know of a thing for tomorrow after that time; and in this connection I may say that I hope we can, by unanimous consent, adjourn over on Fridays for some little time. All of the Members are deluged with office and departmental work, and I feel that we can get better service if we shall adjourn over from Fridays to Mondays.

STATUES OF CAESAR RODNEY AND JOHN M. CLAYTON

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 4, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. I might state that I have conferred with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], the Chairman of the Library Committee, and it is my understanding that he is agreeable to the consideration of this matter in this manner.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 4

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statues of Caesar Rodney and John M. Clayton, presented by the State of Delaware and placed in Statuary Hall, are accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statues of two of its most eminent citizens whose names are so thoroughly identified with the State and Nation.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the Governor of Delaware.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to; and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

AIRPLANES

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation the Committee on Military Affairs of the Seventy-fourth Congress is authorized, as a committee, by subcommittee or otherwise, to continue the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 275 of the Seventy-third Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs by House Resolution 275 of the Seventy-third Congress. The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $30,000 under House Resolution 284 and House Resolution 439 of the Seventy-third Congress is hereby continued for such purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] if this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. McSWAIN. It is. It is not only the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Military Affairs but I presented the resolution to the Chairman of the Rules Committee, which would normally have jurisdiction, and he said he would have no objection, and could conceive of no objection, in view of the work of the committee and its great advantage to the country. I presented the resolution also to the minority leader, Mr. SNELL, this morning, and he had no objection. He said he wished to ask me a question, and I shall be glad to give the gentleman the information which the minority leader said he wished to elicit.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Could we not let this go over until tomorrow? The minority leader is temporarily out of the Chamber attending a meeting. I suggest that the gentleman let this go over until tomorrow morning.

Mr. McSWAIN. I should be glad to have it considered tonight. The minority leader said he wished the RECORD to show how much of the appropriation had been expended and whether or not there would be any further appropriation requested.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to object to the consideration of this resolution at this time.

Mr. McSWAIN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] knows of the splendid work which this subcommittee did not only in the last Congress but all through vacation and, so far, in the present Congress. I understand the minority leader has agreed to this resolution. Why not let it go through?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The minority leader said he would like to ask a question, and he is not here to ask that question.

Mr. BLANTON. The only question he would ask would be whether or not it was going to require more money.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Well, I do not know that. Nothing is going to be lost by letting it go over until tomorrow morning.

Mr. BLANTON. But you will require the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] to be here in the morning, and he is very busy and is needed elsewhere.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman from South Carolina is always here, so that will be no hardship.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman is doing some most important work that requires his time somewhere else.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I appreciate that, but I do not think there will be any hardship in letting this go over until tomorrow.

Mr. McSWAIN. May it come up the first thing in the morning, so that I will not have to remain on the floor?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Certainly, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] expressed himself as being perfectly agreeable to the resolution.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his request temporarily.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask a question. I understood that Mr. DUNN asked unanimous consent to be absent for 4 days. Is that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN]?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it was the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN] who made the request.

AN EMANCIPATION PROGRAM FOR PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein the inaugural address of the Governor of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to present to the Congress and to the people of the United States a truly great human document—an emancipation proclamation for Pennsylvania—the inaugural address of the Honorable George H. Earle, who was inducted into office as Governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania last Tuesday, January 15, 1935.

I want to present this address to my colleagues, not because Governor Earle and myself share the same political faith, and not because he has become the chief executive of Pennsylvania, the State which I have the honor to represent in the House of Representatives. I do it because I sincerely believe this address to be the clearest and best expression of the purpose and objectives of the new deal that has yet been presented.

GOVERNOR EARLE'S DEFINITION OF "A DEMOCRATIC FORM OF GOVERNMENT"

Although Governor Earle has here specifically laid down a plan of action to be undertaken for the betterment of my own State—and one which is worthy of emulation by all others—the underlying philosophy he expounds, and the exposition of the solemn obligations of a government to those it governs, overleaps the boundaries of a single State. Mr. Earle has given us here, in specific and unequivocal terms, a translation into action of that vague phrase, "a democratic form of government."

This is democracy—not a grudging admission of the rights of the unfortunates of this life to a few crumbs left from the full loaf but an eager welcome to them to partake fully of what they have so long been denied.

That, to George Earle, is the essence of the new deal, and its great promise permeates every word of his speech. The principles he espouses are principles which should guide the Nation as well as the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and indeed they shall. For they are fine enough and broad enough to lead us to a happier and saner permanent way of life.

GOVERNOR EARLE BLAZES A NEW TRAIL IN THE KEYSTONE STATE

I ask every one of my colleagues to read Governor Earle's speech and to understand it as we in Pennsylvania understand it.

Pennsylvania in the past has not been a happy State. Too many of its legislators have won the dubious distinction of being errand boys for a selfish privileged few. These have exploited the powers and potentialities of that great State. Mighty industries, wealth-producing mines, and fertile farm lands have been misused to build up a few towering fortunes and financial dynasties at the expense of its 10,000,000 citizens. We have done away with all that. We are on a new trail in the Keystone State.

Pioneering until now only in industrial development, henceforth we also lead in social engineering. This is the significance of Governor Earle's speech; this is the path he will tread.

GEORGE H. EARLE IS EMERGING AS A NATIONAL FIGURE

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and the Members of the Congress to keep before you the name of George H. Earle, and to mark what he will do. He has already served his country well as its Minister to Austria, although in that capacity he was too far removed from the daily stage of our national activities to receive well-deserved attention. But as the Governor of the Keystone State of the Union, George H. Earle is emerging as a new figure on the national scene. Let him but have the strength to realize these high aims and George H. Earle will emerge one of the great men of these trying times.

And now let me read to you the inaugural address of Gov. George H. Earle.

In this oath I have pledged myself to serve the people of Pennsylvania as best I can. These are desperately trying times, bitter times. You are asking, "Where are we going? Where do you want to lead us?"

Solemnly, with the echo of the oath still upon us, I answer that we are going, along with the rest of this Nation, to new ground. Politically and economically a change is necessary. The misery of millions, the insecurity of all, bids us vacate the too easy tolerance into which we were lulled during the past decade.

America, in its pioneer days, was hardy and barefooted, shirt-sleeved, sharp-eyed. America was then ready for whatever came, always striving for a better pasture over the hill. We're going back to that spirit today. Not literally, not seeking new land, but seeking into the future for the security and freedom that makes all land, all property, all life worth while.

America is going pioneering across the mountains of special privilege and predatory wealth that fancies itself securely founded. Pennsylvania, in my administration, is going with America. The farther we are toward the fore, the better.

Every now and then history sits down and rests. The short-sighted say, "Now the last frontier is closed. Now change is ended." But the last frontier is never closed. This summons cannot be ignored or evaded with impunity.

WARNS OF DISINTEGRATION

The punishment of history has descended again and again on those who closed their eyes to the summons. Disintegration, decay, extinction, are the inevitable fate of a nation which refuses to change when the times demand change. The jungle creeps back upon the untended clearing, the sea finds a way through the once adequate dike. When the old enemy is stamped out, a way must be found to defeat the new.

We can no more shirk our pioneering task than the men who first landed on these shores could turn their backs to the wilderness in front of them. We must plunge into and cut away the undergrowth and build. We must explore and experiment, be watchful and not content to rest, until our security is attained.

Our ancestors fought their way forward with axes and plows. Today's pioneering calls for the subtler, but no less necessary, tools of the mind. The obstacles and dangers around us are not the work of external nature, but creations of our ancestors and of ourselves.

Our dangers consist of institutions, practices, fulcrums of political and economic power which exist to the detriment of the people as a whole.

We were building a vast technical machine in these last 100 years. We were improving the methods of agriculture, revolutionizing the processes of industry. We broke through one material frontier after another. But we forgot that no nation is stronger than the law and the morality that bind it together. We forgot one of the oldest lessons of history—that changed physical conditions call for new political institutions.

OPPOSES HASTY CHANGES

I do not mean, of course, that we must try to wipe out the past by revolution or too hasty change. There are fundamental institutions which, I believe, will endure in the fields of economics and politics for thousands of years. Democracy and private property, for instance, may no more be successfully replaced today than the ancient principles of the lever and the wheel have been displaced by our progress in the field of mechanics.

But the right of private property does not mean to me something exactly and precisely defined down to the last detail and the definition graven on stone and buried somewhere in the vaults of antiquity.

It means this: Individual ownership of material goods on terms adapted to serve best the needs of any given community at any given time. When private ownership has been a successful institution, it has meant just that. When private ownership, or any other institution, has set itself against fundamental changes, it has been found wanting. This I believe to be the liberal position, the attitude necessary for permanent recovery.

I believe in the profit motive. I believe in private ownership. They provide the only basis for our present civilization and its future progress. But we cannot escape the fact that today private ownership means the ownership of nothing by the majority of our citizens. Except through charity, they have not even obtained sufficient of the product of private ownership to keep alive. Could any situation be more calculated to undermine faith in private ownership than this?

The timorous cry of mistaken self-interest quavers that the slightest modification of the present political attitude toward business foreshadows the doom of capitalism.

POINTS TO EUROPE

If the reactionaries would turn their eyes in the opposite direction they would have more justifiable cause for alarm. Danger does lie ahead for capitalism and for democracy, unless we are ready to change many of our institutions and practices. Russia is the proof. All Europe today is a panorama of the decay of nations which will not face the necessity for sane, sensible progress.

From Austria I watched that disintegration with my own eyes, and I returned to be your candidate for Governor with the question in my heart, "Will my Nation be strong enough, intelligent enough, courageous enough to avoid that fate?" I believe the answer is "yes", but I believe the victory will take some fighting and work. It is worth it.

I want to be a part of this fight. I want to share this work. My program was stated fully and, I hope, clearly during the campaign. As I restate it now, you will not find it changed. My convictions have not altered. Rather they have strengthened as the depression continues and the enemies of reform give stronger evidence that they intend to block recovery.

My fundamental conviction is that life must be made more secure for those millions who, by the accident of birth, are left at the mercy of economic forces. I see no just reason for the relative present security which I personally enjoy, by the grace of chance, while most of my fellow-citizens are never at any time separated by more than a hair from want and misery. The gulf is too wide, the contrast too sharp. I have long felt in my heart that there is something basically wrong with this disparity. And with my eyes I have seen what is wrong during this depression.

The benefits of all our progress have gone to a few, though it was the masses that made the progress possible. The few cannot go farther without the many. The few who enjoy wealth are chained, not only by bonds of humanity, but by bonds of cold economies to those who now falter by the wayside through no fault of their own.

What is our material wealth? It is made up of factories, farms, stores, and mines in which the needs of men are made and distributed. When that distribution stops, when production stops, wealth vanishes. No man is so rich that his fortune can long endure without that foundation of all business—customers. Customers—in this mass-production age—means the whole body of labor.

For a long time past, labor has not received its proper share of the profits of industry. The farmer is not getting his proper share of the profits of the farm.

By "proper" I do not only mean fair and just—I mean the share which is called for by the iron necessity of the business set-up of this country.

CITES NEED FOR MARKETS

I mean that America needs new markets for the products of her machines and farms. We cannot find them abroad. We cannot find them on Mars. We must create new markets by increased purchasing power to the customers of industry, the masses who labor in field, factory, and store.

As Governor of this State, which is truly the keystone of America's industrial system, I shall wage a determined fight to readjust the balance of purchasing power. Minimum-wage laws, abolition of sweatshops, protection of the right of unionization, decent workmen's compensation laws, and unemployment insurance are but a few of the lines on which this fight must be won. Child labor must never return.

Pennsylvania has lagged behind in legislation and executive policy in this vital field. Some of our so-called "better citizens" have boasted that labor was weak in Pennsylvania; that this was a "good" State for employers. That boast sticks in their throats today if they have intelligence enough to realize that the depression has been intensified here precisely because Pennsylvania lagged in labor legislation.

DEPLORES FATE OF AGED

Nor am I going to forget the veterans of industry and the veterans of agriculture, who have just as much claim upon the State as the veterans of our wars. In settled rural communities of a century ago old age brought its recompense. It brought rest and the security in which the younger members of the family carried on in the well-loved fields to earn the living by which they supported their parents.

That is gone now. Filial devotion has not died. Sons still want to care for their parents. But often they cannot. The shift and strain, the insecurity, has become too great. If they can save a penny, they need it for their own wives and children. No man knows today what economic misfortune tomorrow will bring. So the aged, who, in their prime, built the present, are shunted out into economic and social oblivion.

This army of worthy old men and women is beaten into exile from the economic system at every crisis, just as aged inhabitants of besieged cities were once sent to die outside the walls so they would not deplete the rations.

MAKES PLEA FOR RELIEF

We who revert to this barbarism have not even the excuse of necessity. We have the machines, the tools, the materials to produce enough for all without sacrifice. We can feed these aged.

Then in the name of humanity and hard-headed sense, let us feed them! Let us give them a decent life in their own homes when their work is done. An old-age pension system is not a sentimental gesture. It is as much a necessity of modern life as steel and electricity. It fits into the jigsaw puzzle the world is trying to reconstruct from the aftermath of the industrial revolution of the nineteenth century.

A moment ago I spoke of the ancient security of rural communities. They are no longer secure. Not only does the weight of an unjust taxation and monetary fluctuation bear them down, but they have fallen into the control of big business which has impoverished them with one hand while it exploits the consumer with the other.

I refer in particular to certain of the large milk distributors operating in this and other States. When I look at the recent history of these companies in their relation to the farmer and to the public, I am driven to one conclusion—that the men in charge of them hope to clean up personal fortunes in a few years and get out before public indignation catches up with them.

They cannot be looking far ahead. After all, the human worm will turn. And if ever there was occasion for public resentment, these certain milk distributors have given that provocation.

Milk is the most vital of all necessities that can be dealt in commercially. The public is at the mercy of its milk supply. Moreover, in this part of the Nation, dairying is the backbone of agriculture.

DENOUNCES DISTRIBUTORS

Yet these men have had the effrontery to attack the roots of both our rural and urban existence. Briefly, they kept up the price of milk through the depression so that fewer and fewer persons could buy enough. With the consumption of milk fallen below half the amount necessary for minimum healthful diet standards, they turn to the farmer and cut his income on the plea that a milk surplus exists.

Surplus, indeed. I know where that surplus is—and so do they. It is in the fat salaries that these men who dominate the Milk Trust receive. It is in the watered stock of some of these companies. That's the only surplus in the milk business.

These companies maintain a virtual monopoly. They fix prices to the farmer. And the difference between the two returned some of the larger milk companies a profit of 30 percent consistently through the worst years of the depression.

This administration will end that in Pennsylvania. There is going to be a milk-control law with teeth in it. Since prices are already being fixed for this public necessity, then the public is going to have the controlling voice in the milk business of this State.

Such regulation is the only alternative to public ownership. The big milk dealers are not the only ones who do not recognize this danger. Their brothers of the utilities seem quite as blind to the impending storm. They won't shorten sail, although the hurricane warnings fly from every jackstaff on the political coast.

PLEDGES STRINGENT CONTROL

But the utilities do not yet realize that the golden goose is in his death throes. I want to save the utility companies. I want to protect the thousands of investors in utility companies in Pennsylvania. These investors will suffer if public-ownership competition comes. The movement for municipal light and power plants is growing throughout the country.

I know we are supposed to have utility regulation in this State at present. But that is not the sort of regulation I'm talking about. This administration will introduce a public-utility law so stringent that no public-service commission can stultify it without full public knowledge.

Relations between utility companies and their holding companies should be under the jurisdiction of the public service commission.

Further, all expenditures of utility companies should be subject to public scrutiny and control.

It has been the practice for many years to use a part of the surplus profits squeezed from the public to fight the public. Candidates have been bought with utility-company campaign contributions, usually in secret. Lobbies have been maintained here at Harrisburg by these funds. So great has been the power of these extralegal groups that not a bill passed, not a move could be made without their consent.

We propose to root out the lobby evil. First, to destroy the utilities' lobby by cutting off its source of revenue. Second, by striking at all lobbies.

There must be an end to the invisible government by lobbies and lobbyists in Pennsylvania. The legislation of Pennsylvania must be written in the State capitol and not in the private parlors of Harrisburg hotels where special-privilege lobbies have held forth so many years.

SEES MOCKERY OF GOVERNMENT

I intend to give the people a day-by-day account of the activities of these lobbyists if the necessity arises. Any legislator influenced by them will have to make his explanations to his constituents. It is time that this vicious system, which makes a mockery of representative government, be dragged out into the open and into the light of publicity. Only in that way can it be ended.

I have another word of warning, not unconnected with the utilities, for it refers to their real masters—a little group of all-powerful bankers. These bankers are the backbone of the reactionary opposition to the new deal. These bankers have a fondness for masking their activities behind the phrase "protection for the widows and orphans."

Strike at excess milk profits and they cry out that widows and orphans are the shareholders of the milk companies. Strike at high utility rates and the same wail rends the skies. It is these bankers themselves who are endangering the funds of widows and orphans by driving the consuming public to desperation.

Wall Street sent $14,000,000,000 of American funds abroad in the last 10 years, exclusive of the war debts. How much of those foreign loans are coming back? Precious little. We all know that now.

PLEDGES PROTECTION

But these bankers knew it then. And whose funds were these? Widows' and orphans' and the ordinary American small investor. Do you hear them deploring this betrayal of the widows and orphans?

This administration will do its utmost to protect the investors of Pennsylvania. But it will take neither direction nor advice from this powerful banking clique which in the past has had so much to say about the operation of this State government. For the next 4 years, and I hope I speak loudly enough to be heard in Wall Street—it's "Hands off Harrisburg."

I am deeply concerned over the plight of those thrifty men and women who, through no fault of their own, have suffered because their savings are tied up in closed banks. Liquidation of these deposits has been slower in Pennsylvania than in any other State. There is no excuse for this. We are going to speed up the process of returning these funds to their owners.

The banking lobby here has blocked certain legislation designed to strengthen the banking system of the State. If this legislation had been in effect, I am convinced the banking collapse would have been far less severe. Let us remember that lesson. We must enact restrictions which will make it more difficult for bankers to dissipate the funds of their depositors.

Building-and-loan associations have an almost unique and, in the main, honorable history here in Pennsylvania. But in recent years practices have crept into some of them which should be stamped out so that these splendid institutions may regain their real place in the financial life of the community.

Pennsylvania plutocracy reflects itself also in our tax situation. Although 60 percent of the wealth within the State is in the form of stocks, bonds, and other personal property, 90 percent of local taxation is derived from real estate. This grossly unfair situation is a perfect example of the dead hand of the past crushing the present, which I mentioned earlier.

When our present State constitution was written in 1874, real estate amounted to 90 percent of the wealth and should have borne that portion of the tax. But is there any reason why a situation which existed 60 years ago should crush our home-owners and farmers today?

The remedy lies in a graduated State income tax. The soundest tax is that based on the principle of ability to pay. We are going to bring that principle to Pennsylvania.

Revision of the State constitution is absolutely necessary. Pennsylvania simply cannot continue further with the absurdly antiquated constitutional provision which restricts its borrowing capacity to $1,000,000, an infinitesimal part of our annual expenditures.

No business could operate soundly on that basis. In times of stress such as these, we ought not increase taxes drastically to meet the necessity for increased relief expenditures. The sound way, the business way, is to borrow when expenditures must be increased and pay back in days of increasing income. This fossilized restriction causes the State treasury to face today a grave financial crisis which would not have arisen under a modern constitution.

PLANS BUDGET MESSAGE

I will discuss the serious financial problems which confront the Commonwealth in detail in a budget message which I will address to the legislature in the near future.

Constitutional revision is one of the most immediate needs of Pennsylvania. We can all see it is no academic subject if a very ill-timed tax increase is made necessary in order to meet the needs of relief.

Can we reduce State relief expenditures? There is no escape in that direction as long as the Federal Government does not bear the full burden. As long as Washington does not assume entire responsibility, there can be no talk of cutting relief expenditures.

It is quite likely that we can effect some administrative savings by coordinating the various relief agencies which now duplicate each other to some extent. But such savings we must not keep. They must be passed along in increased benefits to the unemployed whose present subsistence level is shamefully low.

I know there is a sneering mention of Santa Claus whenever any public official advocates an increase in relief. Such propaganda fails to impress me. I know from whence it emanates.

The same banking group that shudders at a Federal expenditure of $4,000,000,000 is the one that sent your $14,000,000,000 over to Europe and down to South America never to return.

CITES WALL STREET DEBACLE

What of the $80,000,000,000 of inflated 1929 valuation, which withered away? Where are the expressions of contrition from Wall Street for that debacle? Are they hiding their faces in shame? Not they. From behind the backs of the widows and orphans these brave grenadiers of high finance are firing their propaganda of so-called "economy and budget-balancing" against the unemployed, the helpless, the down-trodden.

I believe in work relief rather than the dole. Work is in this Nation's blood and sinews. Americans do not want to idle about half starved on Federal doles. We want to make, to build, to earn a living wage. We cannot in a day or a decade stop the trend of centuries which instituted the necessity of work. If we try, beware of disastrous psychological consequences.

We will care for the unemployed, but let us beware of creating unemployables. This is a Nation of workers. Please God it may not be saved from being a Nation of economic slaves only to become a Nation of drones.

My administration will cooperate to the utmost in an intensified relief program. Above all, let the expenditures be concentrated so that business can feel a real impact of purchasing power. Only thus will confidence be restored. Only thus will business begin to reemploy our idle millions. We cannot use trench-warfare tactics against the depression. We must strike with the full-focused strength of all our financial resources.

Do not misunderstand me. Because I believe in spending money for recovery, it does not follow that I do not appreciate the importance of economy in governmental administration. I intend to conduct the State government on strictly businesslike lines. It is not supposed to be good politics to cut down on pay rolls. But that is exactly what I intend to do.

FAVORS LOCAL REORGANIZATIONS

Local communities, particularly Philadelphia and Allegheny Counties, can save money for their taxpayers by reorganizing their governments. Consolidation to meet modern conditions should be a part of the program of the State constitutional convention.

In closing, let me explain that I know well that I have said things in this address which the timid souls will consider politically unwise. I have attacked powerful groups, well-established institutions. I am ready to take the consequences. This office of Governor is the realization of my political ambitions, not the stepping stone.

I will make mistakes, I know, but they will be mistakes of the head and not of the heart. I will never do anything or refrain from doing anything because of considerations of my future political career or the future political career of any of my friends. This administration is going to live and work in the present. That task is large enough.

I will be more than content if 4 years from today I can feel that I have played a small but willing part in the saving of this Nation from the dangers that encompass it; that I have helped it push forward to new economic and political frontiers.

We know in which direction the salvation of democracy and American ideals lies. Let us go forward!

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, January 18, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXTENSION OF FUNCTIONS OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

As in legislative session,

Mr. FLETCHER. I introduce a bill to extend the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and so forth, and ask to have the bill, along with a synopsis of it and explanation of it, printed in the RECORD at the same time.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1175) to extend the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for 2 years; to authorize loans or renewals or extensions to mature not later than January 31, 1945; to empower the Corporation to buy railroad obligations, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in aid of railroad reorganization and in certain other circumstances; to empower the Corporation (a) to aid the mortgage situation generally by the purchase of nonassessable stock in mortgage loan companies and similar financial institutions, and to authorize the sale of stock, capital notes, or debentures purchased by the Corporation; and (b) to purchase any portion of the assets of closed banks under certain conditions; to increase the authorized investments in preferred stock and capital notes of insurance companies, or loans thereon, from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000; to continue the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Export-Import Banks of Washington, D. C., as agencies of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and, with the accompanying synopsis and explanation, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. 1175, in the Senate of the United States, 74th Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to extend the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for 2 years; to authorize loans, or renewals, or extensions to mature not later than January 31, 1945; to empower the Corporation to buy railroad obligations, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in aid of railroad reorganization, and in certain other circumstances; to empower the Corporation (a) to aid the mortgage situation generally by the purchase of nonassessable stock in mortgage loan companies and similar financial institutions, and to authorize the sale of stock, capital notes, or debentures purchased by the Corporation; and (b) to purchase any portion of the assets of closed banks under certain conditions; to increase the authorized investments in preferred stock and capital notes of insurance companies, or loans thereon, from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000; to continue the Commodity Credit Corporation, and the Export-Import Banks of Washington, D. C., as agencies of the United States; and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That until February 1, 1937, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to continue to perform all functions which it is authorized to perform under law, and the liquidation and winding up of its affairs as provided for by section 13 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, are hereby postponed during the period that the functions of the Corporation are continued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2 (a). Except as provided in section 9 of "An act relating to direct loans for industrial purposes by Federal Reserve Banks, and for other purposes", approved June 19, 1934, no funds shall be disbursed on any commitment or agreement hereafter made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make a loan or advance, subscribe for stock, or purchase capital notes or debentures, after the expiration of 1 year from the date of such commitment or agreement; but within the period of such 1-year limitation no provision of law terminating any of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be construed to prohibit disbursement of funds on commitments or agreements to make loans or advances, subscribe for preferred stock, or purchase capital notes or debentures.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, disbursement may be made at any time prior to January 31, 1936, on any commitment or agreement heretofore made by the Corporation to make a loan or advance, subscribe for preferred stock, or purchase capital notes or debentures.

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding any other provision of law limiting the maturity of obligations taken by it to shorter periods, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may make loans or advances or renewals or extensions thereof to authorized borrowers or by other suitable agreement permit them to run so as to mature at such time or times as the Corporation may determine, not later than January 31, 1945: Provided, That in respect of loans or renewals or extensions of loans or purchases of obligations under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as heretofore and herein amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, ch. 14), to or of railroads, the Corporation may require as a condition of making any such loan or renewal or extension for a period longer than 5 years, or purchasing any such obligation maturing later than 5 years from the date of purchase by the Corporation, that such arrangements be made for the reduction or amortization of the indebtedness of the railroad, either in whole or in part, as may be approved by the Corporation after the prior approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SEC. 4. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, ch. 14), is further amended by striking out all of the third sentence of the third paragraph thereof through the first colon and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Within the foregoing limitations of this section, the Corporation, notwithstanding any limitation of law as to maturity, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, including approval of the price to be paid, may, to aid in the financing, reorganization, consolidation, maintenance, or construction thereof, purchase for itself, or for account of a railroad obligated thereon, the obligations of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, including equipment-trust certificates, or guarantee the payment of the principal of, and/or interest on, such obligations, including equipment-trust certificates, or, when, in the opinion of the Corporation, funds are not available on reasonable terms through private channels, make loans, upon full and adequate security, to such railroads or to receivers or trustees thereof for the purposes aforesaid: Provided, That in the case of loans to or the purchase or guarantee of obligations, including equipment-trust certificates, of railroads not in receivership or trusteeship, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, in connection with its approval thereof, also certify that such railroad, on the basis of present and prospective earnings, may reasonably be expected to meet its fixed charges, without a reduction thereof through judicial reorganization, except that such certificate shall not be required in case of such loans made for the maintenance of or purchase of equipment for such railroads: And provided further, That for the purpose of determining the general funds of the Corporation available for further loans or commitments, such guaranties shall, to the extent of the principal amount of the obligations guaranteed, be interpreted as loans or commitments for loans":

SEC. 4a. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, ch. 14), is further amended by striking out at the end of the third paragraph thereof the colon and the proviso. "Provided further, That the Corporation may make said loans to trustees of railroads which proceed to reorganize under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, 1933", and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

SEC. 5. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, ch. 14) is further amended by inserting after section 5b thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 5c. To assist in the reestablishment of a normal mortgage market, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may, upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, subscribe for or make loans upon the nonassessable stock of any class of any mortgage loan company, trust company, savings and loan association, or other similar financial institution, now or hereafter incorporated under the laws of the United States, or of any State, or of the District of Columbia, the principal business of which institution is that of making loans upon mortgages, deeds of trust, or other instruments conveying, or constituting a lien upon, real estate or any interest therein. In any case in which, under the laws of its incorporation, such financial institution is not permitted to issue nonassessable stock, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized, for the purposes of this section, to purchase the legally issued capital notes or debentures of such financial institutions. Notwithstanding any other provision of law the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe (which regulations shall include at least 60 days' notice of any proposed sale to the issuer or maker), sell, at public or private sale, the whole or any part of the stock, capital notes, or debentures acquired by the Corporation pursuant to this section, and the preferred stock, capital notes, or debentures acquired pursuant to any other provision of law."

SEC. 6. Section 5e (a) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, ch. 14), is amended

(1) By inserting in the first sentence thereof after the words "the assets" and before the words "of any bank", the following: ", or any portion thereof,";

(2) By inserting in the second sentence thereof after the words "such assets" and before the words "held for the benefit" the following: ", or any portion thereof,".

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, Commodity Credit Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware as an agency of the United States pursuant to the Executive order of the President of October 16, 1933, shall continue, until April 1, 1937, or such earlier date as may be fixed by the President by Executive order, to be an agency of the United States. During the continuance of such agency, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of Farm Credit Administration are authorized and directed to continue, for the use and benefit of the United States, the present investment in the capital stock of Commodity Credit Corporation, and the Corporation is hereby authorized to use all its assets, including capital and net earnings therefrom, and all moneys which have been or may hereafter be allocated to or borrowed by it, in the exercise of its functions as such agency, including the making of loans on agricultural commodities.

SEC. 8. Section 1 of "An act to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to subscribe for preferred stock and purchase the capital notes of insurance companies, and for other purposes", approved June 10, 1933, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 15, ch. 14, sec. 605e) is amended by striking from the last sentence thereof "$50,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$75,000,000."

SEC. 9. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Export-Import Bank of Washington and the Second Export-Import Bank of Washington, D. C., banking corporations organized under the laws of the District of Columbia as agencies of the United States pursuant to Executive orders of the President, shall continue, until June 16, 1937, or such earlier date as may be fixed by the President by Executive order, to be agencies of the United States and in addition to existing charter powers, and without limitation as to the total amount of obligations thereto of any borrower, endorser, acceptor, obligor, or guarantor at any time outstanding, said banking corporations are hereby authorized and empowered to discount notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt for the purpose of aiding in the financing and facilitating exports and imports and the exchange of commodities between the United States and any of its territories and insular possessions and any foreign country or the agencies or nationals thereof, and, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, to borrow money and rediscount notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and other evidences of debt for the purposes aforesaid. During the continuance of such agencies the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce are authorized and directed to continue, for the use and benefit of the United States, the present investment in the capital stock of said banking corporations.

SEC. 10. No obligations, contingent or absolute, shall be incurred for the expenditure or other disposition of funds heretofore, hereby, or hereafter appropriated, or otherwise obtained for the carrying out of functions of Reconstruction Finance Corporation unless within estimates of such obligations and expenditures approved by the Director of the Budget, and, to the extent that the Secretary of the Treasury may consider practicable, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, there shall be maintained on the books of the Treasury Department such accounts as may be necessary to give full force and effect to this provision.

The synopsis and explanation referred to are as follows:

SYNOPSIS OF DRAFT BILL EXTENDING THE FUNCTIONS OF THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Section 1: Extends the functions of the Corporation until February 1, 1937, subject to prior termination at such earlier date as the President, by proclamation, may determine.

Section 2: Puts a 1-year limitation on disbursement of future commitments (except commitments to aid in the completion, repair, or improvement of self-liquidating projects heretofore financed under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932) by the Corporation, and authorizes the disbursement of past commitments at any time prior to January 31, 1936.

Section 3: Authorizes the Corporation to make loans or renewals with maturities up to January 31, 1945, instead of January 31, 1940, as now provided.

Section 4: Authorizes the Corporation, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission and with certain other limitations, for the purpose of aiding in the financing, reorganization, consolidation, maintenance, or construction of railroads, to purchase or guarantee railroad obligations, including equipment-trust certificates, or to make loans to railroads, receivers, or trustees thereof upon full and adequate security.

Section 4a: Eliminates a duplication which will exist in section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, if the amended section 4 herein proposed is adopted.

Section 5: Authorizes the Corporation, when requested by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to purchase stock in mortgage-loan institutions (the same as in banks and insurance companies) for the purpose of aiding in the reestablishment of a normal mortgage market. It also authorizes the Corporation to sell, under certain conditions, the stock, capital notes, or debentures acquired pursuant to this section, and the preferred stock, capital notes, or debentures of banks heretofore or hereafter purchased.

Section 6: Section 5e now authorizes the Corporation to purchase all of the assets of a closed bank under certain conditions. The proposed section 5e would authorize the Corporation to purchase any portion of, as well as all of, the assets of such closed banks.

Section 7: Authorizes the continuance until April 1, 1937, of the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the Government.

Section 8: Authorizes an increase in the total funds of the Corporation which may be invested in purchases of, or loans on, preferred stock and capital notes of insurance companies from $50,000,000 to $75,000,000.

Section 9: Authorizes the continuance until June 16, 1937, of the export-import banks as agencies of the Government and broadens the powers of these banks, subject to certain restrictions.

Section 10: Places in the Director of the Budget determination of the expenditures which shall be made by the Corporation, notwithstanding the availability of funds authorized by Congress.

EXPLANATION OF DRAFT BILL

SECTION 1

Section 1 of the draft bill would extend the lending power and other active functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for 2 years beyond the present date of expiration of such power. Under the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, approved January 22, 1932, the Corporation was permitted to make loans at any time prior to the expiration of 1 year from the date of enactment of such act, and the President was given power to postpone such date of expiration for an additional 1 year. The President subsequently exercised such power, and the life of the Corporation was extended up to January 22, 1934.

In "An act to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes", approved January 20, 1934, Congress authorized the Corporation to "continue to perform all functions which it is authorized to perform under existing law" until February 1, 1935.

Section 1 of the draft bill would again postpone the date of the expiration of the Corporation's lending functions until February 1, 1937, or such earlier date as the President might fix by proclamation.

SECTION 2

Section 2 (a) is a reenactment with certain clarifying and necessary changes of section 2 of "An act to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes", approved January 20, 1934.

There has been some doubt as to whether the term "loan or advance", as used in section 2 of such act, is sufficiently broad to include subscriptions for preferred stock or purchases of capital notes or debentures, and accordingly the language of the section has been broadened so as to include these other functions of the Corporation.

The proposed section 2 expressly excepts from the operation of the section commitments made under section 9 of the so-called "Industrial Loan Act", approved June 19, 1934. Such section 9 authorizes the Corporation to make further loans in connection with "self-liquidating" loans made by it prior to June 26, 1933, for improvements, extensions, etc., to projects so financed. Owing to the nature of the work performed with the proceeds of this type of loan, it is felt that it would be unsatisfactory to require disbursement of loans under section 9 within a 1-year period from the making of the commitment.

Section 2 (b) provides that the Corporation may make disbursement on account of any commitment heretofore made to make a loan or subscribe to preferred stock or purchase capital notes or debentures at any time prior to January 31, 1936. Under existing law such disbursement may be made only up to the expiration of 1 year after the date of the commitment.

There are many situations, as in the case of receivers' loans, where it has been found, through no fault of the borrower, that disbursement within 1 year from date of the commitment is either impossible or inconvenient. Unless the period of disbursement is extended to take care of such cases, each case will have to be submitted to the board of directors and a new loan made. This would, of course, involve a great amount of inconvenience and delay.

SECTION 3

This section of the draft bill would permit the Corporation to make loans for sufficiently long periods to enable borrowers to repay the Corporation without the drag on business activities which might be attendant upon too rapid utilization of capital for such repayments.

Section 3 of the draft bill provides for loans or advances or renewals or extensions thereof to mature not later than January 31, 1945, instead of February 1, 1940, as under existing law.

This section contains a proviso that as a condition of making loans to railroads or railways, or purchasing the obligations thereof, for a period longer than 5 years the Corporation may require:

"That such arrangements be made for the reduction or amortization of the indebtedness of the railroad, either in whole or in part, as may be approved by the Corporation after the prior approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission."

This proviso is considered to adequately protect the Corporation's interest in connection with these long-term loans, and is in accordance with the plan for the scaling down of the debt structure of railroads and railways approved by the President.

SECTION 4

This section of the draft bill is designed to clarify and broaden somewhat the power of the Corporation to be of assistance to the railroads of the country. It proposes to add certain new words to section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act so as to permit the Corporation, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to purchase for itself, or for account of a railroad obligated thereon, obligations, including equipment trust certificates, of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, in addition to the making of loans to such railroads which the Corporation is at present authorized to make.

Section 4 of the draft bill would authorize the Corporation, in addition, to guarantee the payment of the principal of, and/or interest on, such obligations.

In lieu of the present phrase, "to aid in the temporary financing", the following language has been inserted in section 4: "To aid in the financing, reorganization, consolidation, maintenance, or construction." This language is designed to clarify the position of the Corporation in regard to the assistance which it may give to railroads and railways, and to somewhat enlarge the scope of such assistance.

The first proviso requires the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the case of loans to or the purchase or guarantee of obligations of railroads not in receivership, to certify that such railroad, on the basis of present and prospective earnings, may reasonably be expected to meet its fixed charges without the necessity of a reduction thereof through judicial reorganization. This certificate is not required in the case of loans for the maintenance of, or purchase of equipment for, such railroads, since such loans might be advisable without such a certificate, because they would provide work.

The second proviso at the end of the proposed amendment would require the Corporation to interpret as loans or commitments for loans any guaranties made pursuant to this section, to the extent of the principal amount of the obligations guaranteed.

The reason for including this certification in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act is that the requirement for certification of such loans is not included in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, but is part of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1933, which provides in part as follows (sec. 15):

"The Commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, if it is of the opinion that such carrier is in need of financial reorganization in the public interest."

The continuance of such provision seems desirable, but at present it will expire June 16, 1935, unless renewed. The proviso in the draft bill is more specific than the above section 15 in that it deals with fixed charges rather than the vague and uncertain term "in need of financial reorganization." The proviso thus furnishes the Commission with a more definite standard on which to base its approval or disapproval of R. F. C. assistance to railroads.

SECTION 4 (A)

This section of the draft bill would eliminate the proviso contained in section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, which authorizes the Corporation to make loans under section 5 to trustees of railroads under section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act. Such proviso is no longer necessary in view of the use of the word "trustee" in section 4 of the draft bill.

SECTION 5

Section 5 of the draft bill would add a new section to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, to be known as section 5 (c). This section would give the Corporation the power to assist in the reestablishment of a normal mortgage market by subscribing, upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President, to the nonassessable stock of mortgage-loan companies, trust companies, savings-and-loan associations, and other similar financial institutions whose principal business is that of making real-estate mortgage loans. It also authorizes the Corporation to sell, under certain conditions, the stock, capital notes, or debentures acquired pursuant to this section or any other provision of law.

The Corporation is of the opinion that the reestablishment of a Nation-wide market for sound real-estate mortgages is an important element in recovery. The proposed amendment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act would enable the Corporation to be of assistance to this field.

SECTION 6

This section of the draft bill is designed to clear up an ambiguity in the language of section 5e (a) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended. Such section 5e (a) authorizes the Corporation to "make loans upon or purchase the assets" of closed banks and to make loans upon or purchase assets of closed banks which have been trusteed for the benefit of depositors. Some doubt has arisen in interpreting the language of this section as to whether the term "assets" means necessarily all the assets of a closed bank or whether it would permit the purchase merely of a portion thereof. In order to clear up this ambiguity the words "or any portion thereof" have been added after the word "assets" in the two places in the section where necessary.

SECTION 7

This section of the draft bill would continue the status of the Commodity Credit Corporation as an agency of the United States until April 1, 1937, or such earlier date as may be fixed by the President.

The Commodity Credit Corporation was organized under the laws of Delaware, pursuant to an Executive order of the President, dated October 16, 1933. The capital stock was subscribed for by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, and is held by them in trust for the United States. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the principal creditor of the Commodity Credit Corporation, because of the loans it makes to it under section 201 (d) of the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932.

The authority for the creation of the Commodity Credit Corporation is found in section 2 of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which provides: "To effectuate the policy of this title the President is hereby authorized to establish such agencies, * * * as he may find necessary, * * *." Such section further provides, however, that "This title shall cease to be in effect and any agencies established hereunder shall cease to exist at the expiration of 2 years after the date of enactment of this act, * * *." The effect of this language is that on June 16, 1935, without any new legislation, the Commodity Credit Corporation would probably cease to be an agency of the United States.

It is felt, however, that the Commodity Credit Corporation still has many necessary functions to perform, and that its life should be extended as provided in section 7 of the draft bill.

SECTION 8

The Corporation, as of January 15, 1935, has authorized the investment of $100,000 in purchases of preferred stock of insurance companies and the investment of $35,775,000 in loans on preferred stock and capital notes of such insurance companies, making a total of $35,875,000. Under the existing act there is a limitation of $50,000,000 on the amount of funds of the Corporation which may be invested in such purchases or loans. Applications now pending before the Corporation and others in immediate prospect indicate that the entire balance of the fund will be more than absorbed. It is believed that an additional $25,000,000 is required to take care of pending and future legitimate requests.

SECTION 9

This section of the draft bill would continue the status of the Export-Import Bank of Washington and the Second Export-Import Bank of Washington, D. C., as agencies of the United States until June 16, 1937, or such earlier date as may be fixed by the President.

The Export-Import Bank of Washington was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, pursuant to Executive order of the President dated February 2, 1934. The bank was capitalized at $11,000,000, of which the preferred stock of $10,000,000 was subscribed for by this Corporation and the money for the common stock of $1,000,000 was made available from the funds provided by section 220 of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

The Second Export-Import Bank of Washington, D. C., was organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, pursuant to Executive order of the President dated March 9, 1934. The total authorized capital of $2,750,000 is divided into $250,000 common stock, subscribed for out of the funds made available by section 220 of the National Industrial Recovery Act, and $2,500,000 preferred stock subscribed for by this Corporation.

The authority for the creation of both of these banks is found in section 2 of title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which provides:

"To effectuate the policy of this title, the President is hereby authorized to establish such agencies * * * as he may find necessary * * *."

Such section further provides that "this title shall cease to be in effect, and any agencies established hereunder shall cease to exist, at the expiration of 2 years after the date of the enactment of this act * * *." The effect of this language is that on June 16, 1935, without any new legislation, the Export-Import Bank of Washington and the Second Export-Import Bank of Washington, D. C., would probably cease to be agencies of the United States.

Section 9 of the draft bill is also designed to correct certain legal inhibitions in the banking laws of the District of Columbia which seriously hamper the operations of the export-import banks.

If a Government-owned bank for financing export and import trade is to become a part of our domestic economy, it should be given a status which would permit it to carry on its business unhampered by constant doubts as to the extent of its authority and without the embarrassment of unnecessary legal restrictions.

In the first place, the District of Columbia Code forbids the organization of banks of discount. The power to discount is, however, one of the most important functions of a modern banking institution, and the draft bill would remedy this situation by specifically giving the export-import banks the power to discount or rediscount notes and other obligations. This section also authorizes the banks to borrow money and rediscount obligations with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The District of Columbia Code applies section 5200 of the National Bank Act to all banks doing business in the District of Columbia, thus limiting loans to any one borrower to 10 percent of the bank's unimpaired capital and surplus. This provision has no proper application, however, to foreign banking where advances of large sums against shipping documents is common practice. Because of the limited capital of the Second Export-Import Bank the limitations of section 5200 have been particularly onerous, and the draft bill provides for the making of loans without limitation as to the total amount of obligations thereto of any borrower.

SECTION 10

This section was inserted at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury. It places in the Director of the Budget determination of the expenditures which shall be made by the Corporation notwithstanding the availability of funds authorized by Congress.

EXPANSION OF COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF

As in legislative session,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, which in effect increases the number of beneficiaries from the several States and Territories who may be admitted to the collegiate department of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf from 125 to 145. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred, together with a letter from the Secretary of the Interior urging the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1180) to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the number of beneficiaries from the several States and Territories authorized by section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, for admission to the collegiate department of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf be, and it hereby is, increased from 125 to 145.

The accompanying letter is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 17, 1935.

The CHAIRMAN,
Committee on Education and Labor,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Enclosed is a copy of a proposed bill to amend section 4865 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, increasing the number of beneficiaries from the several States and Territories who may be admitted to the collegiate department of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf.

For the education of deaf mutes in the District of Columbia, the United States has established and maintains the Columbia Institution for the Deaf. The advance department, known as "Gallaudet College", accepts students from outside the District, most of whom are in poor circumstances and need the help of the scholarships offered by the institution. Although Congress has restricted the number of such beneficiaries, it has progressively expanded its authorization to provide for a steadily increasing demand for enrollment. Thus the original limit of 40 has been increased first to 60, then to 100, and finally, in the year 1918, to 125. The enrollment has again reached a point where authority to increase the number is necessary.

It is respectfully requested, therefore, that this bill be placed before the Senate for appropriate action.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

REGULATION OF TRAFFIC IN PETROLEUM

As in legislative session,

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced Senate bill 858 reenacting in effect section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act relating to the transportation of oil. This was the section of that act held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in the Amazon and Panama cases. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] introduced a joint resolution somewhat similar. These measures have been before the Committee on Mines and Mining, and we have agreed upon the draft of a new bill in which are incorporated some of the suggestions contained in the measure of the Senator from Oklahoma. So I ask leave to reintroduce the measure at this time with that explanation and have it referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

INCREASE OF CAPACITY OF THE PANAMA CANAL

As in legislative session,

Mr. GORE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. Owing to the general interest in the subject matter, I should like to have the joint resolution printed in the RECORD. It is very brief.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 36) to authorize an investigation of the means of increasing capacity of the Panama Canal for future needs of interoceanic shipping, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Governor of the Panama Canal is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the means of increasing the capacity of the Panama Canal for future needs of interoceanic shipping, and to prepare designs and approximate estimates of cost of such additional locks or other structures and facilities as are needed for the purpose, and to make progress reports from time to time of the results thereof.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION RESOLUTION

As in legislative session,

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 88) making additional appropriations for the Federal Communications Commission, the National Mediation Board, and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the joint resolution insert the following:

For an additional amount for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of Public Act No. 125, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a commission to establish the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the Commonwealth of Virginia", approved March 21, 1934, including salaries, travel and subsistence expenses as authorized by law, to be immediately available, $4,000.

THE WORLD COURT

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive A (71st Cong., 3d sess.), protocols concerning adherence of the United States to the Court of International Justice, the pending question being the amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG to the resolution of adherence, as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, inasmuch as I propose to address myself exclusively to the pending reservation to the protocols of adherence to the World Court, I ask that the clerk read the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Resolved further, That adherence to the said protocols and statute hereby approved shall not be so construed as to require the United States to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political question of policy or internal administration of any foreign state; nor shall adherence to the said protocols and statute be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I am attracted by the amendment he has offered, and I recall what transpired in the Committee on Foreign Relations. May I ask the Senator what does he mean and what will he have it understood is meant by the words "shall not be construed"? Shall not be construed by whom?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the language which is contained in this reservation, as I shall subsequently indicate, is in the historical form which has followed down through the entire assertion of these rights by the Senate for many years. Whatever appropriate construction attaches to it attaches traditionally, and the Senator is quite as competent as am I to make the interpretation. Possibly as we proceed I can make plain what I have in my own mind.

Mr. President, the language read by the clerk speaks for itself; indeed, the language read by the clerk makes the only speech that should be necessary in defense of the proposed reservation. It is plain and simple language. It is an invincible recital. It is a statement of policy often asserted by the Senate heretofore, and never heretofore denied by the Senate upon any occasion when the Senate has been invited to announce it. The theory and meaning of the reservation are not denied by any of the proponent Senators who are most eagerly pressing our adherence to the World Court. In the face of such a situation I confess that it is something of a shock to me to find any resistance whatsoever to this reassertion of this historic policy. Indeed, when the Committee on Foreign Relations a few days ago rejected the amendment by the significantly close vote of 11 to 9 it was done without any discussion whatsoever, because, I take it, none of us contemplated that there would be any question raised against this regular procedure in behalf of the assertion of this regular, traditional, fundamental, and unchallenged American doctrine.

One of the outstanding advocates and earnestly zealous enthusiasts in the country in behalf of World Court adherence, one in whose judgment I have great confidence, was in contact with me upon this subject this morning, and I asked him what his verdict would be upon this reservation. This was his language in reply. He said, "It is an excess of caution, but it is harmless."

Mr. President, it is never an excess of caution for the American people, and the Senate speaking in their behalf, to reassert the traditional and fundamental policies which we have pursued in all our international relations for years.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment. If all that can be said against it is that it is harmless, then I submit it should be accepted lest those of us who feel its deliberate rejection would be harmful can be satisfied in our opinion.

I yield now to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. A brief statement will be necessary in order to make clear my position in this matter, and I ask the attention of all Senators.

The domestic policies of the United States are not subject to the approval of foreign governments. It is a strange process of reasoning, in my judgment, that would prompt one who insists that domestic policies and traditional policies are solely matters for the consideration of this Government, to put the proponents of the doctrine in the position of depending on foreign governments to consent to that principle, or inviting them to reject that principle.

There is nothing in the pending resolution or any result that can come from it which detracts from, restricts, or impairs any domestic policy of the United States. When the issue is raised to submit to the 54 or more signatories to the World Court the question of whether in consenting to the World Court the United States reserves all questions pertaining to its domestic policies is a course which I cannot comprehend, if that course be pursued by one who believes in maintaining the domestic policies of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will be patient, I think I can demonstrate to him very clear reasons why the Senate should again do precisely what it has done heretofore and what the Senator from Arkansas himself has heretofore supported under like circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall be very patient. I shall not again interrupt the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I welcome the Senator's interruptions, because the thing we are all seeking is information.

When the Senator from Arkansas says it is a strange process of reasoning which would present a declaration of this character in connection with an engagement of this nature, I refer him back to his own support of precisely the same type of statement upon at least two previous occasions, as I shall subsequently indicate.

Mr. President, I repeat that I do not rise to enter on a general discussion of the World Court question. There are many phases of it I should like to traverse. But time does not permit this afternoon, and I do not want to be diverted from my special purpose. I address myself exclusively to the pending reservation. I want to assert with the greatest respect but in the plainest possible language that I consider it to be a simple and conclusive test; that is, the vote upon this reservation will be a simple and conclusive test whether Senators are completely convinced that the protocols do not infringe upon the traditional and indispensable policies of the United States essential to our peace and our independence. It cannot change the actual contract one way or the other, but it can demonstrate our own understanding of the contract beyond further argument.

I am not conceiving an America which is cut off from voluntary cooperation in the promotion of the peace of the world. That always has been one of our high and persistent aspirations. This is a foreshortened world, and I shall clearly indicate before I shall have concluded that I have no prejudice against voluntary international cooperation on the part of the United States. But neither do I envision a United States capabe of making a useful contribution to peace, and the peace of the world in particular, except as it does preserve, without any question or shadow of a doubt whatsoever, its own inherent independent right to make up its own mind respecting these issues and its maintenance of its own traditional attitudes.

Mr. President, it is my contention, precisely as it is the contention of the Senator from Arkansas, that the protocols pending do not intend to infringe upon any of those rights which are recited in the pending reservation. This is the reason why I have been willing to sustain the protocols. It is equally the reason for my presentation of this reservation to confirm my belief in specific terms. But my belief in the conviction of like-minded Senators upon this floor will be shaken if, after listening to a simple statement of the facts involved, they shall reject a reservation which is nothing more than a reiterated assertion in specific terms of what proponent Senators claim to be the unimpaired American status. I confess to utter amazement that there should be any semblance of challenge to such standard.

I think perhaps a general statement ought to be made about my attitude toward the fundamental question so there may be no mistake about it. It is frequently asserted that no one is interested in a reservation to these protocols except as he is interested in defeating the fundamental issue itself. My record denies any such purpose so far as I am concerned, although I most certainly do not challenge the good faith of those who support reservations, regardless of whether they intend ultimately to attack the entire proposition. They certainly are logical in wanting every possible safeguard embraced. It seems to me that those who share my view of the pending contract are no less logical. It is one point where all minds should meet.

My record of 15 years publicly and privately is that I would not take America into the League of Nations under any circumstances whatsoever. That is my position today. I would not consciously approach one single inch of a step toward American membership in the League of Nations. That continues to be my position today. But I have argued all through this same period that it is possible to create an effective discrimination and distinction between the League of Nations and the World Court.

This is my conception of what is intended by the pending protocols. I want to make it very clear because I am one of those who voted to report these protocols in spite of my disappointment that the committee should reject this interpretative amendment which is wholly in harmony with this viewpoint. I want to make it perfectly plain that in my judgment under the program of proposed adherence we are left wholly free to decide for ourselves in each individual instance whether we choose to enter the Court as plaintiff or defendant or as litigant in any capacity whatsoever; that we are wholly free from the menace of any advisory opinions by the Court over our objections whenever we have or claim an interest; that we are bound only if, as, and when we choose to be bound; that these are the literal conditions in the instrument itself; that these are the explicit interpretations of those who sponsor and promote this legislation; that we therefore hazard no foreign entanglement and no surrender of traditional American positions and attitudes.

If I am right, I argue that all Senators, whether favorable to Court membership or not, should be eager to identify those landmarks beyond all possible misunderstanding or subsequent dispute. If it be what has been termed an "excess of caution", it is none the less advisable. If it be reiteration, nothing is lost. On the other hand, if I am mistaken in my opinion of the letter of the bond—and I have the greatest respect for the fears upon this score expressed by opponents to any Court adherence whatever—then much is gained for all of us, and for the country, by an explicit identification of the thing we think we do. I can at least identify the thing I think I am doing by offering and by sustaining this reservation.

I want to say again that I draw a sharp distinction, as I have for 15 years, between the Court and the League. I concede that if we were to be taken into the Court without adequate protection for our fundamental rights the discrimination could not be preserved; but I think it is possible to preserve these rights and I think the intent of the pending protocols is to preserve them. I take this position with respect to that, with a reiteration that I would not consciously approach one single inch toward membership in the League of Nations. I agree with the statement upon that subject made by President Roosevelt in 1932—not the statements he made in 1920 but the statement he made in 1932, when he said:

> American participation in the League would not serve the highest purposes of the prevention of war and the settlement of international difficulties in accordance with fundamental American ideas. Because of these facts, therefore, I do not favor American participation.

In that same address, which was before the New York State Grange, President Roosevelt was advocating a trade conference with the other nations of the world. He further said:

> Such a conference should not by any stretch of the imagination involve the United States in any participation in political controversies in Europe or elsewhere. Nor does it involve the renewal in any way of the problem 12 years ago of American participation as a member of the League of Nations.

That is the spirit in which it should be possible for us to give our limited adherence to the World Court. At any rate, it is my conception of the thing we are asked to do. Certainly the expressions in the pending reservation are but a paraphrase of the President himself as he spoke upon this other occasion.

So I assert again that I want, if possible, to clinch the discrimination between the Court and the implications of the League. Those who are like-minded, Mr. President, certainly cannot logically vote to reject the pending amendment, which does nothing except to reassert the fundamental American attitude and the fundamental American policy, which has been similarly asserted upon every other occasion, when either the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate or the Senate itself has ever heretofore acted upon this question.

I beg of Senators to think of this open-mindedly, because there is a reality to the advisability of this declaration. If the declaration never had been made heretofore in these connections, the situation might be different; but, since it has been made heretofore, the affirmative refusal to repeat the declaration today too easily invites what I believe to be the false implication that there is a change in the status from the status upon these other occasions.

The important thing about this reservation is its history, Mr. President. I am not speaking of the history of the idea behind it, because the history of the idea behind it would be a survey covering every hour of the American story from the neutrality proclamation of 1793 down to date. It would start with Washington and Hamilton and Jefferson, and, with few detours, it would be the continuous story of dominant, priceless, and indispensable American tradition.

Senators know the history of the idea. It is impregnated in the very air we breathe. I beg of them to be equally attentive to the history of this specific reservation and the language of it, because therein lies the challenge to our reiteration of this reservation, and therein lies the possible danger of an unfortunate implication if it be not reasserted.

What is the history of this precise pending reservation?

Mr. President, in the first place, this precise language originally appeared as the fourth paragraph of the fifth reservation to the resolution of World Court adherence in 1926. Let us not have any misunderstanding about this identification of it. The able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a few days ago said that this particular resolution—I mean the original of 1926—was not a part of the fifth reservation. I think he made that categorical statement. So far as the record of the Senate is concerned, I think the facts dispute his conclusions, because, as I indicated at the time, the Executive Journal of the Senate itself, volume 64, part I, pages 541 and 542, describes this precise original reservation as "the fourth and last paragraph of reservation no. 5."

Mr. President, so far as the official record of the Senate is concerned, it still is the fourth and last paragraph of reservation no. 5. It is still the fourth and last paragraph of reservation no. 5, because there is no denouncement of it in the pending protocol of accession—exhibit C in the pending Senate document.

Since there is no denouncement of it in the protocol of accession, and since that protocol reads that:

> The States signatories * * * have mutually agreed * * * subject to the five reservations formulated by the United States in the resolution adopted by the Senate on January 27, 1926—and then that "The States signatories * * * accept" the reservations, subject only to the conditions that follow, and since there are no conditions that follow which refer directly or indirectly to this particular reservation, it would seem to stand today as included specifically within the contract to which we are invited to adhere. That could be a conclusive reason for my belief that we are inherently protected, among other reasons. Still, it would not be a reason for abandoning reiteration, because the Senator from Arkansas says it is not in the contracts; that the language was not part of the original fifth reservation. I think his word was "ambiguity" as he spoke of one other apparent disagreement between text and resolution. Certainly there is an ambiguity here. Indeed there is a direct clash. There is a direct dispute between the record and the Senator from Arkansas in this connection; and if there were no other reason than that alone, since this relates to a fundamental policy and a fundamental American right we should make perfectly certain that we say what we mean, so that he who runs may read.

Mark you, we are now at the birth of the language of this specific reservation. It is my reservation only by adoption. It was written by former Senator Swanson, of Virginia, who now sits in the President's Cabinet at the head of the naval portfolio. If there was need of it in 1926—and apparently the then Senator from Virginia thought there was need for it—there certainly is emphasized need for it today. At any rate, we are tracing the history because the history is significant in respect to the challenge which is laid to the conscience of Senators as they pass upon this reservation ultimately.

We find, I repeat, in the first place, that it was born—and I remind you again that this is the literal, verbatim language, without the change of a comma, which was offered by the Senator from Virginia at that time—we find this precise reservation, then, born in 1926 under the auspices of the distinguished Senator from Virginia. Evidently he saw no such impropriety in it as is now charged to its lineal descendant.

Secondly, when the Senate acted upon the entire body of the reservations in 1926, and upon the fifth reservation in particular, it acted paragraph by paragraph. There is no mistaking the record in this respect. Although other paragraphs and other parts of the fifth reservation were debated at great length and were the subjects of heated divisions and frequent roll calls, this particular paragraph was accepted by acclamation. The Senate Journal does not disclose a single voice or vote against it. Apparently it never occurred to anybody then that there could be any reason against it, or that there was any novelty or strange process of reasoning attached to its promulgation. There is none now unless our prospective status has basically changed, which I deny, and which the sponsors of ratification at least vocally deny.

So, now, let us remember that we are tracing the story of the precise reservation which now rests upon the bar of the Senate. We find first that it was written by the then Democratic Senator from Virginia, Mr. Swanson. We find, secondly, that it was unanimously adopted, all by itself, by the Senate of that day in connection with the voting upon our limited adhesion to the World Court. Next, after it had been voted into the resolution of ratification, which was on January 26, 1926, the Senate finally passed upon the whole contract as it then impended, and it did so by roll call. In that contract which the Senate then approved was the precise reservation now resting upon the bar of the Senate. It was adopted by a vote of 76 to 17. Manifestly, all of the 17 approved the reservation, because the reason of their objection to the completed contract was that it did not adequately protect the thing which this reservation asserts.

Who were among the other 76, Mr. President, who then voted affirmatively upon this proposition, and validated not only the specific language now pending as an amendment but validated its attachment to our proposal to adhere to the World Court? I call the roll simply to indicate the extent of the credentials which the pending amendment has.

The following Senators who are still Members of this body voted that day in favor of the thing which is now pending:

Senators Ashurst, Capper, Copeland, Couzens, Fletcher, George, Gerry, Glass, Hale, Harrison, Keyes, McKellar, McNary, Metcalf, Neely, Norbeck, Norris, Pittman (the present Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee), Robinson, of Arkansas (the distinguished leader upon the other side and the sponsor of the pending resolution of adherence), Trammell, Walsh, the late Senator from Montana, whom the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] justly eulogized the other day for his faithfulness in this and every other cause, and Wheeler.

Thus, the language of the pending reservation was imbedded in the Senate's official mandate in 1926. Now, remember, we are following the story of this thing which we are now asked to reject upon the one hand, but which I am asserting to you every force of logic and prudence and every challenge of the record calls upon us to reintroduce into our resolution of adherence.

What happened next? We find that this thing was the language of the then Senator from Virginia. We find that it was unanimously approved by itself by the Senate of the United States. We find then that, imbedded in the resolution of adherence, it was eloquently approved upon roll call, as I have indicated. What is the next entry on the record?

After the failure of international agreement upon the action of the Senate in 1926, the World Court issue next arose officially in 1932. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee again acted. It again voted to recommend an American formula of adherence, this time under the primary leadership of the late Senator Walsh, of Montana. This was after the so-called "Root formula" was in being. It was precisely the same situation in all its aspects which the Senate confronts today in respect to the form of the pending resolution.

There was no difference in the status then and now. What happened when it was proposed in the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in May 1932 to attach this precise amendment to our resolution of adherence? Why, Mr. President, it was unanimously accepted. It never occurred to anybody that there was any question to be raised against it. The late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, was particularly willing, as I recall, because of my conversations with him, to have this affirmative statement made in respect to the thing which we think we are about to do. He was more than willing to make assurance doubly sure.

Members of the Senate still sitting in this body who will again pass upon this precise amendment, who voted that day to attach it to the resolution of adherence, are the following:

Senators BORAH, JOHNSON, CAPPER, LA FOLLETTE, VANDENBERG, PITTMAN, the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, ROBINSON, of Arkansas, HARRISON, GEORGE, BLACK, WAGNER, CONNALLY, and LEWIS.

This happened on June 1, 1932. What in the interim has changed the situation so that it now ceases to be proper to do that which at that time everybody agreed was proper?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure the able Senator from Michigan would not leave the intimation that I had approved the World Court in the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I am asserting that the Senator was happy to approve this particular reservation then, as he did this week. He agrees with me upon the reservation, but not upon the ultimate objective.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not recall the previous vote. I do not recall any vote whatever, but I only wish it to be clear that I have never approved adherence to the World Court when voted on in the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I want the record perfectly clear that that was not my assertion. I stated only that the able Senator twice approved the pending reservation when it was then submitted; and that is the record.

Now comes an interesting thing in this chronology: I ask you to remember that this was June 1, 1932, when the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, and the former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Fess, reported the World Court resolution to the Senate with appending reservations, one of which was the amendment which I again offer. Mark you, this was June 1, 1932, when the World Court resolution was reported to the Senate with this resolution appending. Twenty-six days later the Democratic National Convention met in Chicago, and it was under the chairmanship of the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh. In that convention at Chicago, 26 days later, what was it that the Democratic National platform had to say about the World Court? The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] already has read it, but he did not linger upon the ultimate and controlling phrase in it. This is what the convention said in its platform:

> We advocate * * * adherence to the World Court with appending reservations.

Mr. President, what reservations were appending at that time except those that were reported on June 1, 1932, by the very distinguished Democrat who presided over the convention in Chicago which made this assertion? Can there be any denial that the reference embraces the appending reservations of June 1, only 26 days previous?

What were the appending reservations which the majority party, now so substantially in control of the decisions that are made in this body, thus approved? What was the obligation which was written into their platform in respect to this thing?

> We advocate * * * adherence to the World Court with appending reservations.

There can be no doubt of the obvious answer. And one of the appending reservations, Mr. President, beyond any chance of controversy, was the precise reservation which they now have a chance again to adopt in keeping with their promise. If there is any doubt, furthermore, about the fact that they particularly meant this pending reservation, I call attention to the further language in their platform, which, in its discussion of foreign relations, said:

> We advocate * * * no interference in the internal affairs of other nations.

Mr. President, that is nothing more nor less than a short but accurate paraphrase of the very reservation which now invites the Senate's action and which beckons these gentlemen to validate the promise that they made to the country in this aspect in 1932. Their promise was to adhere to the World Court with appending reservations. That was on June 27, 1932. The only appending reservations to which it could possibly refer are the appending reservations which 26 days previously had been offered upon this floor by the distinguished Democratic Senator who presided over the convention as its chairman. I am sure, upon reflection, they will keep faith.

It does not make much difference what the Republican platform commitment was, unfortunately, in the purview of our roll-call mathematics. Nevertheless, for the purpose of the record—and we are counting the chronology to see what it is that leads us, as I see it, irresistibly to again approve the appending reservation—what did the Republican convention say? After a specific endorsement of the World Court, it said:

> The party will continue to maintain its attitude of * * * going forward in harmony with other peoples without alliances or foreign partnerships.

That was the platform of my party, and my entire World Court attitude is in harmony with it and with the recommendations which my party's President have submitted to the Senate upon this score. The pending reservation is but the lengthened shadow of this quoted phrase, even as it mirrors the presumable purport of the pending protocols themselves.

Against this historical background which approves the pending reservation in spirit, if not actually by letter upon every occasion and upon every test, we now come down to 1935, at this good hour, and what happens now? Mr. President, the next appearance of this precise language, without the change of a comma—the next appearance of this precise language is in the Foreign Relations Committee on January 9, 1935, when, without a word of explanation or debate and solely upon the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the committee, to my amazement, voted 11 to 9 to decline to do that which the Senate itself had done upon every previous occasion when invited, and that which the committee itself had been willing to do—glad to do—upon a previous occasion.

So finally in the chronology the reservation now comes to the Senate itself, and it is this thing of which I am speaking, and it is this challenge that I am laying to the attention of the Senate. The Senate is asked once more to do precisely the same thing that it has always done without any deviation whatsoever upon every other occasion in connection with this contemplation.

Why, why is the situation so different today, I beg to ask? What are the conditions that are different today than they were in 1932 when Senators Walsh and Fess reported this same reservation upon the Root formula itself? What is the difference between the situation in which we find ourselves today and the situation in which the Foreign Relations Committee found itself in May 1932? There is no difference whatsoever. Therefore in the natural course of events the normal thing to have expected in the Foreign Relations Committee was that the unanimous experience that we have had with this reservation heretofore would again occur. But it did not. And so we find ourselves in the amazing situation, Mr. President, that this assertion of fundamental American purpose and principle which heretofore always has been affirmatively announced—we find ourselves in the amazing position—confronting a situation in which it is affirmatively rejected. It is this act of rejection which lends chief emphasis to my anxiety to reassert the doctrine involved, lest the rejection some day may invite an interpretation which I am sure was not intended by the Senators themselves.

I confess I am unable to conjure the reasons which could justify rejection. Have we shifted our position? Someone might say so, according to the record in the Foreign Relations Committee. Yet it is my view that we have not shifted our base at all. But if we have not shifted our base, why should not we readily again reassert the thing that has always been asserted heretofore without any thought of a rejection? Is there anything contradictory, Mr. President, in this pending reservation and in the body and purport of the protocols themselves? The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] says there is nothing inconsistent. That is my view. It is my view that we merely invite the Senate to say in terms what the proponents of the pending protocols assert in generality to be the American status in respect to the particular things here under discussion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Michigan to say, as a matter of fact, that there is no necessity for this resolution.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; the contrary, because of collateral implications.

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator to say that this protocol and our adherence to the Court under the protocol would not be a sacrifice of the traditional policies of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is my view. But I assert the corollary to it, that since in addition to that inherent fact it has been thought advisable heretofore to make an affirmative assertion on the subject—wisdom in which I cordially concur—there is a most unfortunate implication raised when there is an affirmative rejection of the same sort of a statement today. That is the chief measure of real necessity, in my view. I can think of no reason whatsoever in logic why it should be rejected unless it is contradictory, and I have yet to hear a proponent Senator testify that it is contradictory. If it is contradictory, let us have the direct testimony, because there ought to be candor in international relations or there certainly never will be peace. And if there is to be candor, and if there is to be clarity, where is the objection to an assertion as contained in the pending reservation—an assertion of the precise thing which we mean? What is the objection to saying what it is that is in our hearts and souls?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BULKLEY. Does the Senator think that if this reservation should be adopted by the Senate it would necessitate the whole agreement's going back to all the signatory powers for specific acceptance?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, so far as my view is concerned, I should say not, because this is a statement of our understanding of what we mean when we sign up, and how long has it been since we could not say for ourselves what we think we are doing when we are doing it?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. WHITE. In connection with the question asked by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], is it not true that if the reservation as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations is adopted by the Senate it must still go back to conference, and there still must be a further or a newer protocol of accession?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is opening a new phase of the discussion, which I prefer not to enter, because I wish to concentrate upon the thing which is before the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. My question was only suggested by reason of the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I assume the able Senator from Maine is about to discuss the change of language in another section of the contract, and I do not want to be diverted into that field. I will say this to the Senator from Ohio, also, that if there is any question of consent involved, I call his attention to the fact that this precise pending reservation defined in the Journal of the Senate as the fourth and last paragraph of reservation no. 5, as the able Senator from Ohio well knows, because he studied it with me as he sat here the other day, is already accepted by other signatories under the protocol of accession, so far as the record is concerned. And why in the name of common sense, after on the face of the record it has been accepted abroad, we should hesitate to reassert it at home certainly challenges the human imagination.

Mr. BULKLEY. I should think that if it had been accepted it would no more need reassertion than any other matter.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I agree, Mr. President; but one trouble is, there is a disagreement as to whether it has been accepted, because the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] insists it is not part of reservation no. 5. Now, you can take either horn of the dilemma you want. If it is duplication, there is no harm done; if it is not duplication, most certainly the Senator from Ohio wants to reassert it precisely as I do. So why not give ourselves the benefit of the doubt instead of somebody else?

The President of the United States in his message to the Senate upon the subject of World Court adherence describes what he hopes will happen in connection with adherence. What is the only bill of particulars submitted by the President of the United States himself in respect to what he hopes the Senate will do in respect to this pending question? This is all he has to say:

> I urge that the Senate's consent be given in such form as not to defeat or to delay the objective of adherence.

Mr. President, there is nothing in this pending reservation which could either delay or defeat the objective of adherence. On the contrary, the acceptance of this reservation might well hasten final action and might actually improve the chances to do precisely what the President expressed his hope may be done.

So there is no proscription under which this reservation can possibly fall. There is every reason why this thing should be done. There is no reason whatsoever why it should not be done.

I venture to believe that few Senators would say in stated terms, if the situation were reversed—and sometimes it is a good thing to assess a proposition in reverse—I assert that no proponent Senator would affirmatively say that this pending adherence requires the United States to intrude upon, interfere with, and entangle itself in the political questions of policy and of internal administration of some 50 foreign states, and that it involves a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

If you are unwilling to make the affirmative assertion that we do relinquish and that we do surrender, why are you not willing, in the alternative, to make the affirmative assertion that we do not surrender and we do not relinquish?

I ask the Senate again constantly to bear in mind that the controlling importance of the situation is that always heretofore the Senate and the Foreign Relations Committee, without even a division, have made this assertion and attached this amendment to the protocols, and if there be an affirmative rejection today it specifically invites an implication which no man upon this floor would care voluntarily to approve.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the situation clearly calls for the adoption of this reservation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I am very much interested in the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the resolution of adherence. The last clause of the proposed amendment reads:

> Nor shall adherence to the said protocols and statute be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

I wonder if the Senator would object to my putting a little amendment in there to the effect that it is intended that America does not relinquish its traditional attitude under the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will be good enough to offer his amendment independently, I would prefer that course to be followed, for the reason I fear the Senator has not been here during the last few minutes—that I am offering language which is verbatim, without the change of a comma, the precise historical form by which the Senate has always spoken upon similar occasions in respect to problems of this nature. The Monroe Doctrine unquestionably is included. I do not want anybody to have any reason, not even the reason of a misplaced comma, to say that the situation, being different in any aspect, justifies opposition.

Mr. LONG. Then I will not urge my suggestion; but, if the Senator will pardon me for making one more observation along that line, that was before England and France found out that they could do what they pleased around here.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Well, Mr. President, the more rapid the disclosures of the nature to which the Senator refers the greater the desirability for reiterating the declaration which I am urging.

It is not enough to say that the declaration in the proposed reservation is surplusage. It is never surplusage to declare our historic position upon any and every occasion. It will not do to say it is needless. It is never needless to reassert this position. Though it be ten thousand times a twice-told tale, let us never weary of repeating and reiterating this saving philosophy of the Republic.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have a desire to make a few remarks on the question now pending before the Senate, not that I believe I can add anything to what is already known but for the reason that I should like to make a matter of record my own opinion about this question.

I have listened with a very great deal of interest to the speeches which have been made. It seemed to me that when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] had completed his speech we should have known exactly what was pending before the Senate at this time. He clearly pointed out the very narrow question that we were to consider. Since that time the debate has taken a wide range, and I am very much persuaded that fully 90 percent, if not more than that, of all that has been said has been entirely foreign to the question before us.

I listened day before yesterday to that great statesman—and I say it with the utmost sincerity—the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

He is always eloquent, nearly always logical, and what he says is based upon fact. I have always had a great admiration for him. Long before I knew him I thought he was one of the great statesmen of America, and I still think so; and so I listened to his speech with very great attention; but after he had concluded his speech, I was absolutely convinced that nothing could be said that would have very much weight against our becoming a member of the World Court or rather our adhering under the resolution to the three protocols now before us. I have analyzed the speech of the Senator from California since and I believe that I can see, and I believe that I could convince him, that there is not a single valid argument that he advances against affirmative action on the part of the Senate.

I noticed his reference to his grandson, 21 years of age. I have only one grandson, who is about 8 or 9 months old, in whom I am as much interested as is the Senator from California in his grandson. I think that some day when the grandson of the Senator from California is rather glorying in the fact that he had a famous grandfather and while he is reading the statesmanlike papers and speeches of his grandfather, perhaps he will come down to the speech the Senator made the other day, and he will say, in good old Kentucky language, to the others gathered around him, who are also proud of their grandfathers, "What was the matter with grandpap when he made that speech, because there is not very much in it?"

I think the Senator from California, as well as some of the other distinguished Senators, are very much like the old farmer who swore that his horse was 16 feet high when he meant 16 hands high, and, having once sworn it, stuck to it. I really cannot see any argument in what has so far been advanced against our adherence to the protocols. It is true the Senator from California said that he was a sort of "John the Baptist", and that a greater than he would come along to discuss this question. I do not know exactly whom he meant, but I have a suspicion, and I shall listen to the argument of that "greater one" with the same attention that I gave to the arguments which have already been made, hoping that perhaps there may be some sound argument advanced against adherence to the pending World Court protocols.

I know that this question is of considerable importance, and we talk about it as if it were the most important thing in the world; but I assert, and I think truly, that after we shall have ratified these protocols, within 6 weeks thereafter 99 percent of the people of America will not know whether we are a member of the Court or whether we are not, and in just a little while we ourselves will perhaps have to look the matter up in some encyclopedia to find out whether we are a member; but the work will go on.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. What the Senator from Kentucky has stated is just the trouble. About the time people begin to have their rights adjudicated by the World Court, they will not even know where the decisions are coming from.

Mr. LOGAN. I think they always will know; I think the Court will perform its functions; and here it may not be amiss for us to consider just for a few moments the character of work the Court has done. There has been a good deal of talk about its not bringing peace. The Senator from California has rather held it up as a monstrous thing, stating that this Court is an evil thing that is likely to bring all kinds of trouble to the world. I believe, therefore, that it is necessary for us for a few moments to consider some of the questions that have been before the Court and what the Court has done about them. If we will do that, I think we will all have a better understanding of what we are trying to do at this time.

The Senator from California said it was the League of Nations Court. Oh, no, I might say, although I would not say it of the Senator from California, that that suggestion has been spread abroad as propaganda. We had as well say that the Constitution of the United States is a Magna Carta constitution, that it is an English constitution, because our ideas came from Magna Carta, or the Charter of Rights, as to say that the World Court is a League of Nations court. That is a misnomer. It is what it purports to be, a court entirely separate from the League, so far as we are concerned, for the purpose of determining international disputes in a legal way, in an effort to prevent the necessity of the resort to armed conflict in order to settle questions that should be settled by a court.

I think we had just as well admit that this Nation must do one of two things: It must either take part in world affairs in an effort to bring about the betterment of the human race throughout the world, it must discharge its duties as a great nation and must cooperate with other nations, or else it must do that which some of our great Senators think it should do, withdraw entirely from the world, saying that it is economically self-sufficient and able to exist without regard to any other nation and that it will become completely isolated from the world so far as public affairs are concerned. If we take that position, an extreme nationalist position, it will become necessary for us to build the largest navy in the world so that we may protect ourselves against the aggressions of other nations; it will become necessary for us to have the largest army in the world. If we are going to say good-bye to all the world, and have nothing to do with the rest of the world, then we must place ourselves in a position to defend our Nation against all others.

I believe that the United States of America should retain her nationalistic spirit. There is no one, I believe, who is more patriotic than myself, but at the same time the United States of America has no right to say, "I am too big to be subjected to law; I am unwilling to allow any of the controversies that may arise between me and some other nation to be submitted to a court; I insist that I will not be subjected to any legal rule or to international law." It would be just as well, so it seems to me, for some man, rich and powerful in his community, to say, "I will not submit any controversy that I have with my neighbor to a court"; it would be just as well for a capitalist to say, "I am not going to submit any controversy that I have to a court, because perchance the court is made up of laboring men." It would be just as well for a member of the colored population of this Nation of ours, more than 10,000,000 of them, to say, "I do not intend to allow any dispute that I have with another race to be submitted to the court because my people are not represented on the court." I believe—and I am very sincere in that belief—that our becoming a member of the World Court will accomplish much good.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the Court will accomplish all the things that those who are most partial to it believe it will accomplish; I do not think it will solve all the problems of the world; I do not believe that all controversies will be submitted to the Court and settled by it; but I do believe that, although it may not be a very long step, our entry into the Court will be a step in the right direction.

Now, let us examine briefly, because I have no desire to take the time of the Senate unduly, some of the opinions that have been rendered by this Court so that we may ascertain the nature of the questions that have been considered and see whether they are worthwhile or whether they are not.

The very first judgment that was rendered by that Court was in the case of a French steamship. It will be recalled that the steamship Wimbledon wanted to go through the Kiel Canal for the purpose of delivering some munitions of war to Poland, Poland being at war at that time with Russia. Germany said the ship could not go through the Kiel Canal; that it would be an interference with the internal rights of Germany if the vessel should be allowed to go through the canal. But Germany had agreed in a treaty, which it had approved, that the ships of all nations at peace with Germany should on equal terms be allowed to pass through the Kiel Canal.

When the German Government refused to allow this vessel to go through the Kiel Canal, all the interested parties—France, England, Japan, and some other nations which were interested in the question—filed suit against Germany. They filed with the registrar at The Hague a statement of the cause of action and brought Germany into court. The Court determined that Germany was violating the terms of the treaty, which guaranteed that all nations should have equal access to the Kiel Canal if they were not at war with Germany. The case was before the Court for some time. Different phases of it were presented to the Court. It was held that France, the owner of the vessel, was entitled to recover for the damage which may have been sustained. That was just an ordinary controversy which arose between France on the one side and Germany on the other. If they had not had a court to which the matter could have been submitted, perhaps it would have been settled through some form of war.

There is another case I should like to mention. There have been many, but I want to mention just one more. I refer to the case of a Greek subject, Mavrommatis, who lived in Jerusalem. He had a concession to furnish electric light and power and drinking water, which had been granted by the Turkish Government before Palestine was mandated to England. The contract was not carried out. The same rights were perhaps granted to someone else—a British subject, I believe—with the result that through his Government Mavrommatis filed a suit before the World Court. Greece came into court and said it had the right to bring the suit against England because of the fact that the contractor, Mavrommatis, was a Greek subject and Greece had the right, acting for one of its nationals, to bring the suit, because thus Greece became really the party in interest.

The World Court deals only with controversies between or among the nations and not between or among individuals. The Court sustained the contention of Greece and held that the suit might be maintained in favor of Greece as against England. The case went to trial and it was held by the Court that the Greek subject had the legal concession to furnish light and power and water in Jerusalem. The matter was before the Court in one form and another a number of times, and, while it was held that he had that right, I believe the Court decided he was not entitled to any damages, but that England should restore to him the same right which had been taken away.

The opinions which I have mentioned are only two of many where controversies have arisen between nations that have gone into the Court to determine the rights involved. I suppose those who oppose ratification of the treaty feel that it would be better perhaps if we sent our battleships into some foreign port and there terrorized some little nation and forced it in some way to pay a judgment or claim instead of submitting the matter to the Court in a perfectly legal way.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I believe the Senator is one of the Senators favorable to a reciprocal tariff?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; I am.

Mr. LONG. Did the Senator look up the case where the World Court passed upon a reciprocal tariff between Austria and Germany? I have not read it myself.

Mr. LOGAN. Knowing that the Senator from Louisiana is in great need of information, not only about this matter but about a good many other matters, I will read that opinion to him. [Laughter.] I am very glad he asked about it.

Mr. LONG. The Senator had better read the entire book he has in his hand, if that is the reason why he is reading.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield at that point?

Mr. LOGAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KING. I might add that the matter went a little further than indicated by the Senator from Louisiana. It was not merely a question of customs duties, but some persons believe it involved, directly or indirectly or remotely, the protection of Austria against economic and political assaults by Germany.

Mr. LONG. Any other tariff decision would involve that question.

Mr. KING. Oh no!

Mr. LOGAN. This decision was simply the construing of certain protocols or certain contracts, as it were, which had been entered into, certain agreements which had been made. The question was whether Austria-Hungary could enter into the arrangement with Germany without surrendering rights which destroyed or tended to destroy the very existence of Austria as a nation. Let us see what the opinion was. The opinion was requested by the Council of the League of Nations on May 19, 1931. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to this matter the other day as a living example of what is liable to happen to us if we should become a member of the World Court. The question put to the Court was:

> Would a regime established between Germany and Austria on the basis and within the limits of the principles laid down in the protocol of March 19, 1931, the text of which is annexed to the present request, be compatible with article 88 of the Treaty of Saint-Germain and with protocol no. I signed at Geneva on October 4, 1922?

The nations which were attacking the arrangements which had been made between Austria and Germany simply took that customs agreement, filed it with the World Court, and said, "We put to you this question." This action called for an advisory opinion. The League of Nations referred it to the Court and said, "Does this agreement violate the two protocols which are mentioned?" What was the answer?

There were 15 members of the Court. They had different ideas about it. Finally eight of them reached an agreement, it being an 8 to 7 decision, that it did violate the sovereignty of Austria, that she would be surrendering part of her sovereignty if it were carried out. The other seven said it would not be violative of the sovereignty of Austria. Our own member of the Court, Mr. Kellogg, voted with the minority in that case. I cannot see why anyone should make the contention that this is a political court simply because the Court has been called upon to consider treaties.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the Senator from Kentucky know the nationality of the various judges who composed the majority and minority?

Mr. LOGAN. I believe I have the information.

Mr. LONG. I can tell the Senator who they are without reading them. England and France voted for the majority opinion.

Mr. LOGAN. That is only two. England and France voted for the majority opinion. There is no question about that, I believe. They all wrote separate opinions, and it is a little difficult to tell exactly how they did stand. The one I remember who really decided the case was the Italian member of the Court, Anzilotti, whose opinion was controlling.

Mr. LONG. He voted with the majority.

Mr. LOGAN. He was on both sides of the case. He reminds me somewhat of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in his politics in these days. [Laughter.] He took a neutral ground. I believe the book I have before me does not state the names of the judges, but I think France, England, Italy, perhaps Poland, and others I do not recall, voted with the majority. It was a close decision at all events.

Mr. LONG. Will my friend yield further?

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. LONG. I had not looked to see what the vote was. I just know politics that well that I can tell the Senator now how they voted, and if I make a mistake I would almost be willing to say I am making a very serious blunder. Without looking to see who voted which way on the decision, all I know about it is that the Senator will find that England, France, Italy, Poland, most likely Russia——

Mr. KING. Russia was not a member of the Court.

Mr. LONG. Very well; Poland, Italy, and Czechoslovakia all voted with the majority. Why? Because they did not want the reciprocal agreement by which Germany would have the inside track on that trade. If we enter into a reciprocal trade agreement today with Cuba, the Court would have exactly the same jurisdiction over the United States and we would have exactly the same question before them.

Suppose we had an agreement with the Philippines. We have turned them loose and let them go. Immediately it would be said by Japan, "These trade agreements you have established are contrary to what is covered by various treaties." Therefore Japan would vote the other way. England has a trade agreement with Japan and she would vote the other way. It would be found that the United States would be trimmed 9 times out of 10 on the same basis.

It is an interesting fact that these minds, supposed to be judicial minds from England, France, Italy, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and these other countries, should all be of the same character. They vote just as the premiers in those countries would have voted in those cases. The judges are no different from any other politician who might be sitting on the Court.

Mr. LOGAN. May I say to the Senator from Louisiana that I am afraid he is not very well acquainted with politics, except Louisiana politics [laughter], and all of us admit he does know the situation down there. I might also suggest to him that the same argument he and others make against the World Court has been made against the Supreme Court of the United States from time to time. Back in the old slavery days it was said if a judge was from the South he voted for slavery and if he was from the North he voted against it. The same argument advanced by those who say the World Court is not fair has been advanced against every court that has ever existed in the world. There is really no more basis for the argument against the World Court than there has been in the past for the argument against other courts that have been set up to substitute the judgment of the court for individual judgment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The Senator might with propriety allude to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States upon a number of occasions has rendered what many people believed to be political judgments. We recall that it was alleged that Mr. Lincoln made appointments to the Court for the purpose of sustaining his greenback policy, because the Court had held that the act providing for the issue of greenbacks was unconstitutional. I do not say that was a political judgment or a political court. It has been claimed by some that not only the Supreme Court of the United States but State tribunals have rendered political decisions. Senators will recall that when provision was made to decide the question of who was elected President of the United States and an eminent judge of the Supreme Court, Judge Davis, of Illinois, was chosen to preside over the commission, it was openly and secretly charged that a political judgment was rendered that gave the Presidency to the Republicans, and denied it to the one who many believed was duly elected by the people of the United States.

So, Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky will understand and the Senator from Louisiana ought to understand that even in this Republic we are not free from the charge of having political courts and political judgments; but, taking it by and large, the Supreme Court of the United States from the beginning has represented the highest judicial thought and the highest form of morality, and our State courts, by and large, have risen to the responsibilities which rested upon them in their decisions.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator for the splendid statement he has made, better than I could have made it.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further on that point?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. POPE. I call attention to a statement made by Senator Hamlin with reference to the Dred Scott decision. Immediately after it was rendered, Senator Hamlin made a statement on the floor of the Senate in which he said that the Court, referring to the Supreme Court of the United States, "was swayed by political reasons, forgot the rights of Dred Scott, and plunged into this political whirlpool in order to control its currents." At the same time Senator Seward charged, to quote his exact language, that the decision "was the result of a political bargain between the Court and the President."

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am not willing to say that courts are perfect. I am not willing to say that courts never make mistakes. I do say, however, that resort to the courts is the best method that has ever been found to settle disputes between or among individuals. It is the best plan that has ever been devised to settle controversies. If there were no courts, then, to use the old expression, everything would be settled on—

> The simple plan,
> That they should take who have the power
> And they should keep who can.

If the courts have been found the best instruments that we have to settle disagreements among individuals and groups of individuals, I do not believe there is a man or a woman throughout the United States who would be willing to say that we should not try to establish a court where law may be substituted for war; and to deny that it is proper for us to make that effort is to say that we are unwilling to submit our rights to a tribunal where the questions may be determined according to legal principles.

When the United States, a good many years ago, determined to withdraw itself from the world, I think it stabbed very near the heart of the goddess of civilization herself. I do not believe the world can go on unless we can find some way in which questions may be decided according to legal principles rather than settled by the sword.

I noted day before yesterday, when the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was making his speech, that he said we were departing from the tradition of the United States; that for more than a hundred years we had never refused to arbitrate any dispute arising with another nation. I call attention of that distinguished Senator to the fact that we have done nothing and will do nothing, if this court shall be set up, to prevent arbitration of such questions. Specifically, the right is retained. The Court of Arbitration at The Hague which has been in existence for many years still exists, and any nation has a perfect right to arbitrate its questions rather than to go into court. I also call attention, however, to the fact that nearly every State in the Union, so far as I know, has a method of procedure whereby controversies are determined between man and man by means of arbitration; and every court likewise has, as some of the distinguished judges know, a provision that these controversies, private as they are, may be submitted to arbitrators.

How many of you who have practiced law throughout the years have ever submitted a case to arbitration? Once in a while you have done so, but ninety-nine times out of a hundred the courts have been called upon to determine these questions. The courts have decided them, and arbitration has almost fallen into disuse. The only reason why this Nation uses arbitration now is because there has been no other way to settle international difficulties.

Mr. President, I desire to make just a few more remarks that will express better than anything I have said my views on the question that is now pending before us. Since the earliest days of civilization, statesmen and philosophers have dreamed that the day might come when the nations of the world would have a tribunal with power to determine international disputes.

Those who have held to that view justified their advocacy of such a tribunal largely on the ground that any controversy which might arise between the nations could be settled by rules of law rather than by resorting to arms. Those who have advocated such a tribunal have not always understood the difficulties in the establishment of such a court.

These difficulties, of course, grow out of intense nationalism, or what is ordinarily called "patriotism." Patriotism is a good thing. Patriotism is something that ought to dwell in the heart of every American; but superpatriotism, which seems to dwell in the bosoms of some of our Senators, is a bad thing; and when that which we call patriotism will lead us far enough to make us want to deprive someone else in the world of something that is justly his, it is a bad thing.

Nations have always been suspicious of each other, and have been afraid to submit a controversy to any tribunal whose members were not of their own nationality. They have been afraid of other nations, afraid that they would not get a square deal, afraid that they would not have a fair trial. That is just as true in our country today as it will be in the World Court. Every day we hear men saying, "We do not want this particular question to go to some court, because the court is swayed by some particular view that it has upon the question. We believe it is unwise to submit the case to some particular court." That goes on everywhere. In every State in the Union, in every county and municipality in every State, even in the Nation itself, men cry out and say, "We do not believe the courts are fair."

Mr. President, the courts are fair. They may make mistakes, but they are fair, and they do that which is best in the settlement of all disputes of every character. To say that some judge is of a different nationality from our own judges is a very unfair argument.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that in all cases of arbitration we, of course, have to submit our disputes to judges of other nationalities.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very true.

Mr. CONNALLY. There would be no difference between this Court and the arbitration tribunals in that respect.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the distinguished Senators who are afraid of the judges of the World Court if they are acquainted with the record, the standing, and the character of the three judges we have had on that Court. I should like to ask the distinguished Senators who say that the judges will be unfair because they are not of our nationality if they believe that Judge Charles E. Hughes, now Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, when he was a member of the World Court would have decided a case in favor of his own nation simply because he belonged to that nation. I resent any such argument. Judge Hughes would not have done it. Neither would Judge Kellogg do it. Neither would Judge Moore have done it. If the citizens of our Nation would not decide for our Nation simply because they were residents of it or belonged to it, I have no right to argue that the citizens of any other nation would be less fair than the citizens of our own Nation. I do not believe they would be less fair.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that in the arbitration decisions, the Alabama case and many others that I might mention, where the judges, at least in part, were from other countries, we accepted the decisions. Only within the past 2 weeks a decision has been rendered against the United States in the I'm Alone case, where an American judge, a Justice of the Supreme Court, and one of the most distinguished lawyers of Canada sat, and the decision was against the United States, and we accepted it.

Mr. LOGAN. Very true.

Mr. KING. So that in the case of international tribunals to which we have appealed to settle controversies we have accepted the decisions, sometimes with rather poor grace; but, by and large, I think it may be said, from a dispassionate review of the decisions, that they were just and fair in the light of the facts that were presented.

Mr. LOGAN. I thank the Senator; and I believe it may be said that every decision which has been rendered up to the present time by the World Court has been accepted by all the parties to the controversy without a word.

It is the nationalistic feeling which has prevented the United States becoming a party to the World Court treaty. The failure to ratify the treaty and thereby adhere to the Court does not reflect credit upon the statesmen in the United States. Apparently they are afraid that the jurists and statesmen of other nations are so far superior to our own that we could not prove a match for them in a contest over disputed rights. Certainly there is no basis for such an opinion. The American statesmen and jurists are as able as any in all the world.

It is said that more than two-thirds of the Members of the United States Senate have favored adherence to the World Court for many years; and yet, for some reason unknown to the public generally, the treaty has not been ratified. I for one favor the ratification of the treaty at the earliest possible date.

Because of this position it is my purpose to make a few remarks dealing with the subject briefly, though to my own satisfaction.

We have historical data to show that the idea of a tribunal to settle international disputes is not a new one. More than 600 years ago, or, to be exact, about the year 1305, a Frenchman suggested the establishment of a court having jurisdiction to settle disputes among nations. Later, in 1623, another Frenchman was the author of a book which has been translated into English within the last few years, wherein he undertook to make suggestions for the establishment of such a court and as to the jurisdiction which it might exercise. Nothing ever came of the suggestions made by these Frenchmen during the next 250 years, but there was arbitration in 1872 between the United States and Great Britain which revived the idea of an international court, and David Dudley Field outlined suggestions for an international code, which he published in 1876.

When McKinley became President, in his first inaugural address he stated that the "leading feature of our foreign policy throughout our entire national history" had been our insistance on "the adjustment of difficulties by judicial methods rather than by force of arms."

The First Peace Conference was held in The Hague in 1899, and the American delegation was instructed by President McKinley to act upon "the long-continued and widespread interest of the people of the United States in the establishment of an international court." The delegation presented to the Conference a plan, as did the delegates from other nations, and drew up a convention for the settlement of international disputes, and under that convention there was established the Permanent Court of Arbitration. The author, James Brown Scott, discusses this convention in his book, The Hague Peace Conference, at some length. When the American delegation returned it reported that this Permanent Court of Arbitration was a "thoroughly practical beginning" which would "produce valuable results from the outset", and would serve as the "germ out of which a better and better system will be gradually evolved."

The Permanent Court of Arbitration was organized in 1900, when The Hague Convention of 1899 became effective. There was no other peace conference at The Hague until 1907, at which time the convention of 1899 was revised and the maintenance of the Court was provided for. Nearly all of the important nations of the world became "contracting parties" to these conventions. Forty-six States became parties to it and have had a part in maintaining it.

The Permanent Court of Arbitration, however, was not really a court. It simply provided a reservoir from which nations might draw tribunals from time to time. Each State that became a contracting party was entitled to four members. The members held no meetings. The affairs of the Court are directed by an administrative council at The Hague composed of diplomatic representatives of States which are parties to the convention. A tribunal might consist of one person or as many as five. The members of the tribunal were not necessarily from States that were contracting parties. There have been many arbitrations before tribunals of the Permanent Court of Arbitration. The United States has been a party to 6 of these arbitrations: 1 with Mexico, 1 with Great Britain, 1 with Venezuela, 1 with Norway, 1 with the Netherlands, and 1 with Sweden.

Our delegates to the Second Peace Conference at The Hague received instructions from President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Root. These instructions were to bring about the development of the Permanent Court of Arbitration into a permanent tribunal composed of judges who are judicial officers and nothing else, who are paid adequate salaries, who have no other occupation, and who will devote their entire time to the trial and decision of international causes by judicial methods and under a sense of judicial responsibility.

As far back as 1907, President Theodore Roosevelt gave specific instructions that this Permanent Court of Arbitration, which then was no court at all, should be so changed that there should be a court, with judges, with salaries, who should give their entire time to the settlement of international disputes. This World Court idea is an American idea. The idea came from the United States and from some of the great men of the United States, as all of us must know.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LOGAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator, of course, is aware of the fact that Mr. Choate and our other representatives did everything in their power to carry out the instructions which had been given by Theodore Roosevelt, but the delegates to the Conference split upon this rock: they could not determine how the judges were to be selected. However, our representatives did everything they possibly could to bring about the establishment of a permanent court, one that would measure up to the requirements which have just been indicated in the instructions given by Mr. Roosevelt. Now, for the first time—notwithstanding that in the intervening years efforts have been made to determine how the judges should be selected—a plan was suggested in the Versailles Treaty which has met with the approval of a majority of the nations; in fact, all the nations of the world, perhaps, outside of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very true. They agreed upon this Court at the 1907 Conference. The functions of the Court, the purposes of the Court, were all agreed upon, as well as a code or a charter. The rock on which they split was the question of how the judges should be selected, and that was never determined until Mr. Root, who was also a representative of the United States in the 1907 convention, suggested the plan which was followed in selecting the judges of the World Court.

The delegations, representing the various states, were able to agree on a general plan for a new permanent court of arbitral justice, but they could not agree on a method of choosing the judges. The American delegation, however, was sufficiently encouraged to report—

> That the foundations of a permanent court have been broadly and firmly laid. * * * A little time, a little patience, and the great work is accomplished.

It has now been 27 years since the American delegation reported to the then President Roosevelt that a little time and a little patience were all that were necessary for the accomplishment of the great work. The people of the United States are still exercising the patience and still biding their time, but the Senate seems to ask of them to wait and show a greater degree of patience.

The plan which was proposed at the Second Hague Conference never became effective. Later Secretary of State Bacon proposed the establishment of an international prize court with the functions of the Permanent Court of Arbitral Justice, and his efforts followed by those of Secretary of State Knox; but they made little or no progress.

When the World War came on in 1914 there was no effective machinery for handling international disputes, and the only machinery of any kind was the Permanent Court of Arbitration. Perhaps there was no nation in the world that did not believe that when the war was ended a new court would be established, with full power to decide and determine international disputes. The matter, however, was not considered in detail at the Peace Conference, which drew up article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. This article directed the Council of the League to formulate and submit plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice.

That is what the League of Nations did at the time. Instead of its being a League of Nations court, the League of Nations appointed some jurists to meet and prepare a plan for the establishment of a court of international justice.

The Council expeditiously invited jurists to frame a plan for the new court. One was from Japan, 1 from Spain, 1 from Belgium, 1 from Brazil, 1 from Norway, 1 from France, 1 from the Netherlands, 1 from Great Britain, 1 from Italy, and 1 from the United States. These jurists met on the 16th of June 1920 and completed their work on July 24, 1920. Plans had been worked out by many of the neutral nations and many suggestions were made to this body of jurists. The American representative, Mr. Root, solved the difficulty of the method of electing judges. The result of the deliberation of the body of jurists was promptly submitted to the Council of the League of Nations early in August. It was debated by that body. It was finally adopted by the Assembly of the League on December 13, 1920. The project was approved by the Council and Assembly, and was annexed as a statute. The protocol constitutes what may be designated as an independent treaty, and has been signed on behalf of 55 states, and 49 of them have ratified the signatures. Under its provisions it was to become effective when ratified by 28 states; so it may be said that the Permanent Court of International Justice became a fact in September 1921, when that number of states had ratified it.

The first election of judges was held during the same month, and a preliminary session was held at The Hague, beginning on January 30 and ending March 24, 1922. At the first session it was determined that all states may have access to the Court on equal terms, whether or not they are members of the League of Nations. In all, there are 69 states or members of the League of Nations which may resort to the Court for the settlement of disputes.

More than 30 sessions of the Court have been held; and in 11 years it handed down 21 judgments, 24 advisory opinions, and many orders. Crippled as it has been by the failure of the United States to adhere, yet it has settled a large number of international disputes; and no nation has shown its unwillingness to abide by a judgment of the Court.

The jurisprudence of the Court is an important contribution to international law. Its operation has been orderly. Administrative problems have been easy. The expenses of the Court run about $600,000 a year, and have been promptly paid by the governments whose duty it was to pay them.

Members of the Court are elected at the end of each 9-year period. The first election occupied 3 days, but the second election was completed in 1 day. Four special elections have been held to fill vacancies. Candidates are nominated by the national groups in the Permanent Court of Arbitration, and for states not represented in that body national groups created ad hoc. At first the United States declined to make any nominations; but since then it has regularly made nominations. The voting on the election of judges is conducted in the Assembly and in the Council of the League of Nations. All of the 57 members of the League may vote in the Assembly, and a proposal has been made which would enable states not members of the League but parties to the protocol of signature of 1920 to participate in the voting. Under the protocol for American adhesion, September 14, 1929, the United States would be permitted to vote in the elections, both in the Assembly and in the Council.

There are vested in the Permanent Court of International Justice two kinds of jurisdiction. It has jurisdiction over contentious cases. In such cases the jurisdiction of the Court must depend upon the consent of the parties, which may be given by special agreement submitting the particular case or by previous agreement conferring obligatory jurisdiction over cases of a certain kind. Many treaties and conventions contain such general agreements. In a recent report of the Court 443 treaties are listed as providing for its jurisdiction. The most fruitful source of obligatory jurisdiction is the optional clause, now binding on 41 states or members of the League of Nations.

The other kind of jurisdiction is what is known as advisory opinions. They may be requested by the Assembly or the Council of the League of Nations. The Council has requested 26 advisory opinions, but 1 request was withdrawn, and the Court declined jurisdiction on another request because it related to a dispute to which a state was a party without having given its consent. Advisory opinions have been given in 24 instances, and in each instance the opinion has done much toward the solution of an international question.

In 1928 the Assembly of the League decided that the statute should be considered with the object in view of amending it. A committee of jurists was designated to consider the matter, and met in Geneva in March 1929. The Honorable Elihu Root was a member of that committee of jurists. The committee recommended a number of changes, and at a conference of signatories in September 1929 certain amendments to the statute were agreed to and embodied in a protocol for a revision of the statute dated September 14, 1929. Cuba objected, and prevented the protocol becoming effective by September 1930, as had been the intention. Some of the desired results have been achieved by action of the Court in revising its rules, and by resolutions of the Assembly of the League. The judges were increased from 11 to 15. The amendments to the statute will become effective when ratifications of the revision protocol are deposited by all of the parties to the protocol of signature of December 16, 1920. Ratification has been made by 45 of the 49 parties.

Beginning in 1897 the United States, through those in highest authority, has advocated the establishment of such a court. Early in 1923 Secretary of State Hughes suggested to President Harding that the United States should do its part in maintaining the Court by adhering with four reservations to the protocol of signature of December 16, 1920. President Harding promptly asked the Senate for its advice and consent. On January 27, 1926, the Senate gave its advice and consent to adherence by the United States, subject to five reservations. The resolution of the Senate was communicated to the various states signatories to the protocol of signature. These states, through their representatives, held a conference at Geneva in 1926; but the United States refused to be represented, and decided that the reservations in the Senate resolution should be accepted on certain conditions. These conditions were unacceptable to the President of the United States, and nothing further was done until the negotiations were taken up again by Secretary of State Kellogg, when he addressed a letter in February 1929 to the Secretary General of the League of Nations. The Council of the League referred the matter to the committee of jurists which was to study the proposed revision of the Court's statute. This committee drafted a protocol for American adhesion, which was considered by a second conference of signatories in September 1929 and opened to signature on September 14, 1929.

The protocol for American adhesion has been signed by 54 states, including the United States, and ratified by 41 states. It cannot become effective until it is ratified by the United States on the one hand, and by all of the other states which may have ratified the protocol of signature of December 16, 1920.

I might say that, as all Senators well know, five men have served as the Chief Executive of our Nation since this question first arose: President Wilson, President Harding, President Coolidge, President Hoover, and President Roosevelt. Each one of those Presidents has requested of the Senate of the United States that it take such steps as were necessary to bring the United States into the World Court. The great Secretaries of State, such as Hughes and Stimson and Kellogg and Bacon, have advised that we ought to become members of the World Court, and yet for 13 years the Senate apparently has completely ignored its duty in connection with this matter.

It will be seen from this brief recital of the history of the Court that the idea of an international court is not a new one.

The Court is a part of the affairs of the world. Its importance will increase with the years. The United States should not longer delay the ratification of the protocol for American adhesion.

The statute of the Court has been discussed in the public press for the past 13 years, and I shall not take the time to go into that subject. The protocol for American adhesion is likewise familiar to the American public.

There seems to be no material objection to ratification on the part of the United States. No one, except a small group of irreconcilables, attempts to advance a reason why the Senate should not act at the earliest possible time. Our failure to act stamps us more and more as a hermit nation, unwilling to do our part toward substituting law for the settlement of international disputes and for the arbitrament of arms.

No one will gainsay the statement that the most important problem in the world is the working out of plans that will insure permanent and honorable peace among the nations. Those who advocate the establishment of a tribunal to settle international disputes are not afraid of war, but they believe that war is not a necessary function of nations, and that there has been continual progress toward the substitution of law for war since civilization began. When civilization has reached the highest ideals there can be no resort to war. As long as nations resort to war, society is imperfect. Civilization has always been progressive in character.

As proof that law has been gradually substituted for war since the beginning, let me say that before the beginning of government the individual was without law. He sought some favored spot, where he lived because of its natural advantages. These advantages were largely of food, water, and shelter. No law protected him in his right of occupancy. There was no government to which he could appeal for protection. The weapons which nature gave him and the strength of his sinews constituted his equipment for war, both defensive and offensive. If another sought that which he claimed as his own, he resorted to war. His life was one of constant warfare. In protecting what he claimed as his he waged defensive warfare, but if, perchance, he sought the favored spot of another, he engaged in a war of aggression. Then, there was no way of settling disputes other than by war; that is, individual warfare between man and man. Aside from his natural strength, one individual had little advantage over another. There was no agitation over the size of armies and navies.

In the course of time the individual gathered about him a family. The members of the same family did not engage in warfare with one another. Rules were evolved for family government. These rules were the law of the family and they were substituted for war; hence these were the beginnings of the abolition of war and the substitution of law. There was peace in the family household, but each family fought with every other family. There were more days of peace, but the battles involved a greater number of individuals.

Families grew into clans; members of the same clan did not make war on each other; they were governed by the rules of the clan. Law took the place of war in the lives of a greater number of people. This was another step in the abolition of war. Law had made gains and war had suffered losses, but a clan made war on other clans. War had not been abolished, but law had been substituted for war on a larger scale.

The clans developed into tribes and members of the same tribe did not make war on each other. Tribal laws governed the members. Again law had been substituted for war in a larger area.

Tribes developed into states. Those familiar with the history of the feudal days in England will well understand the welding of small warring groups into a great state, governed by laws. With the advent of states there was a further abolition of war. Law was forging its way to the front. The citizens of a state did not war with each other, but the laws of a state governed only those within that state. States made war on each other.

Then came the federation of states, resulting in the substitution of law for war in ever-increasing populations.

I do not mean to say that civil war did not prevail at times within a clan and tribe, or a state, but great progress had been made and law had been recognized as a substitute for war.

Should we say that any country is civilized if it allows its citizens to make war upon each other in the settlement of internal controversies? Should we say that any State of the United States is civilized if it should allow groups of its citizens to obtain by force what they could not obtain in the courts of law? The citizens of a State look to the law for the settlement of all internal disputes. The citizens of one State do not engage in warfare with the citizens of another State, because the laws of the States are the laws of the United States, affording an adequate remedy for the settlement of controveries by law rather than by war. Individuals and groups of individuals submit their controversies to legal tribunals. If a citizen of one State has a grievance against a citizen of another State, he looks only to the law for relief. If one State has a controversy with another State, there is no thought of war. The courts are the supreme power for ending disagreements. The judgment of the court may take from an adversary a vast domain, but it requires no army to put the judgment into effect. An individual, clothed with the majesty and authority of the law, finds no resistance to his official demands.

Peace among members of the human race has been achieved and brought to its present state through a process of education and growth, through a better understanding of each other. He who says that law cannot be substituted for war denies that society is capable of further progress and advance and believes that it has reached its zenith. If we measure the future with the rules of knowledge gleaned from the past, we must conclude that he who argues that war must continue as one of the legitimate functions of national existence is without the support of sociological history. Law prevents warfare among the states of the same nation. Law prevails in every part of the world and affords ample remedy for all wrongs, except the wrong of a nation against a nation. Society is divided into about 60 main groups called "governments." Each of these governments has supplanted war with law within the component parts of the same government. If these 60 governments can agree upon a tribunal or tribunals with judicial powers for the determination of international questions of disagreement, civilization will have taken its last step in the abolition of war.

No one will contend that any international agreement will entirely eliminate violation of the laws made for the settlement of international controversies; but the nations, or the citizens of nations, who should violate the laws for the settlement of such matters would become outlaws, and they could be made to atone to the offended law. The laws governing citizens of a State are frequently violated, but those disobedient to the laws know that organized society is behind the laws, and the punishment of offenders is measured by the laws themselves.

If the statesmen of the world are unable to establish a system of international laws regulating the offensive conduct of one nation toward another and to erect tribunals for the administration and enforcement of such laws, there is little hope for a long continuation of the present cycle of civilization. If this cycle fails to achieve universal peace, there will be a recession into that darkness from which the human race has toiled upward through the painful years. Like Moses, we stand on the mountain in sight of the Promised Land. Shall we take the other step, or shall we leave it to another age which, many thousand years in the future, may have again worked its way up from the depths?

It may not be actual war that destroys the nations of today. The mad race among them in preparation for war is probably as dangerous as war itself. The burden of it all rests on the bent backs of groaning humanity. Year after year the burdens grow heavier. A large part of the earnings of every citizen goes toward the payment of the costs. A large part of the time of every citizen is given in labor to support his government in its warlike activities. The increasing weight of these burdens is fast approaching oppression which has been the chief factor in the downfall of all nations.

It has been said frequently of late that it is possible to abolish poverty. If the money expended for and as a result of war should be expended for the welfare and happiness of the race, the result would be inconceivable. How useful it would be in the fostering of industries for the employment of millions; in the elimination of insanitary conditions in the great cities of the world; in affording opportunities for education and recreation; in the creation of beauty; in the promotion of health; in caring for the unfortunate, and in making happiness the dominant note in every voice and love the law guiding and governing every heart!

The World War shook the very foundation of society and obscured for the time civilization itself. History will never record its horrors. The imagination of man cannot grasp them. Hearts unnumbered were crushed, and sorrow inexpressible was brought into innumerable homes. The moving battle fronts, with carnage-filled trenches, presented a picture that no painter will ever put on canvas, scenes that no sculptor will ever chisel, an epic which no poet will ever give to the world, events that no historian will ever narrate. For more than 4 years the thunder of guns drowned the voices of the world. Mothers prayed that the nations be made sane again. In the darkness of that night hope was born—a hope that the sacrifice might not be in vain—that it was a war to end war. Responsible leaders, impelled by the pressure of public opinion, began to whisper it about that such an unholy spectacle must not again deluge the world in blood.

Then peace came, with its staggering problems. The Treaty of Versailles, with the League of Nations Covenant and provision for a World Court, was the first step toward peace among the nations. One day the world will erect monuments of enduring marble to the memory of those who wrought there; and, among that number, no one wrote his name in larger letters of living light on that immortal page of history than that statesman, philosopher, and prophet, the then President of the United States, the friend of society, Woodrow Wilson. He gave his life for a cause more sacred than any other—the cause of humanity.

There was joy in the hearts of the peoples of the nations when the treaty was signed. The representatives of the nations had opened a door of hope. The United States, for reasons known only to some of her statesmen, failed to carry on. I make no criticism of her conduct. There were currents and cross currents then that beclouded the visions of men. The heart of the people of the United States has always been true to the ideals of those who believe in law as a substitute for war. Our people have not grown faint in their adherence to the idea that finally the nations, acting in unison, will set up the necessary machinery for the abolition of war. No political party in the United States has ever declared against a working agreement which will promote and insure peace among the nations. Our Nation has moved with hesitating steps, but with unfaltering vision, in the path that leads to international concord.

The League of Nations was offered to the world at a time most unpropitious. The fires of nationalism burned brightly and nations were suspicious of each other. It is no cause for wonder that the United States held back, fearing what she might encounter just around the corner. But that is in the past. We did not go in. There has never been a plebiscite on the question. The political campaign of 1920, between the Democrats and Republicans, resulted in no decision against an international agreement. The Democrats declared for a League of Nations with the World Court. A few days prior to the election, the ablest and most outstanding leaders of the Republican Party, including the now ex-President Hoover, issued a manifesto to the American people, advising the voters that the quickest way to get into a league with other nations was to elect the Republican candidates. The question has been an issue in no other campaign. The League has made fair progress notwithstanding the hesitant policy of the United States toward it. It has amply justified its existence; but the question is not whether we shall become a member of the League of Nations. The question now before the Senate is whether we will give our consent to adherence of our Nation to the World Court. The question is whether we are willing to make an honest attempt to substitute law for war.

I have little patience with those who seem to believe that American statesmen are no match for the statesmen of other nations and that we are so unsophisticated in the ways of the world that advantage would be taken of us, if we should submit controversies to the World Court. There is too much depending upon our action for us longer to hesitate. We should speak clearly the voice of the American people, and that voice has been crying throughout the years that we join with other nations in substituting law for war. As an humble Member of this august body, the vote which I shall cast for the ratification of this treaty will afford me more pleasure than any vote that I have cast as a Member of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE WORLD COURT RESERVATION BY SENATOR LONG

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent to send to the desk at this time a reservation intended to be proposed by me to the resolution of adherence to the World Court protocols, and ask that it be printed.

The reservation intended to be proposed by Mr. LONG was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved further, That adherence to the protocols and statute is upon the express condition and understanding that the doctrine pronounced by President James Monroe, known and commonly called the "Monroe Doctrine", is and shall in no manner be affected or modified by the said World Court, and that the rights and duties assumed and heretofore exercised by the United States under said Monroe Doctrine shall never be affected by the said World Court.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED AND NOMINATION WITHDRAWN

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States, submitting several nominations in the Army and withdrawing a nomination, which were referred to the appropriate committee or ordered to lie on the table.

(For nominations this day received and nomination withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, before the roll is called I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if it is desired further to continue the session today?

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand there are some reports to be submitted. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is momentarily absent, asked that I should have a quorum called at this time.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adams | Coolidge | King | Radcliffe |
| Ashurst | Copeland | La Follette | Reynolds |
| Austin | Costigan | Lewis | Robinson |
| Bachman | Couzens | Logan | Russell |
| Bailey | Davis | Lonergan | Schall |
| Bankhead | Dickinson | Long | Schwellenbach |
| Barbour | Donahey | McCarran | Sheppard |
| Barkley | Duffy | McGill | Shipstead |
| Bilbo | Fletcher | McNary | Smith |
| Black | Frazier | Maloney | Steiwer |
| Bone | Gerry | Metcalf | Thomas, Okla. |
| Borah | Glass | Minton | Thomas, Utah |
| Bulkley | Gore | Moore | Townsend |
| Bulow | Guffey | Murphy | Trammell |
| Burke | Hale | Murray | Truman |
| Byrd | Harrison | Neely | Vandenberg |
| Byrnes | Hastings | Norris | Van Nuys |
| Capper | Hatch | Nye | Wagner |
| Caraway | Hayden | O'Mahoney | Walsh |
| Clark | Johnson | Pittman | Wheeler |
| Connally | Keyes | Pope | White |

Mr. LEWIS. I make the same announcements with reference to absent Senators as were made on an earlier roll call and ask that the announcements stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senate proceed to the consideration of nominations on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James A. Moffett, of New York, to be Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of George Fried, of New York, to be supervising inspector, Bureau of Navigation and Steamboat Inspection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COAST GUARD

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Coast Guard.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that nominations in the Coast Guard be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. That completes the call of the Executive Calendar.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Senate resume legislative session.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING

Mr. POPE, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to which was referred the bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 14) thereon.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. McNARY, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 617) for the relief of Roy Alvey Jones, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 269) granting an annuity to Samuel R. Stone, and that it be referred to the Committee on Civil Service. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY]. In my opinion, the reference to the Committee on Finance was erroneous. I have talked with the Senator from Ohio about it, and he has no objection to the bill being referred as indicated.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the change of reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair). Without objection, the Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

REPORT OF GOVERNOR OF THE PANAMA CANAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the annual report of the Governor of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 18, 1935.

REPORT OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the eighty-fifth annual report of the Board of Directors of the Panama Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 18, 1935.

REPORT OF PERRY'S VICTORY MEMORIAL COMMISSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the Fifteenth Annual Report of the Perry's Victory Memorial Commission for the year ended December 1, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 18, 1935.

REPORT OF THE ALASKA RAILROAD

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the Annual Report of the Alaska Railroad for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 18, 1935.

(NOTE: Report accompanied a similar message to the House of Representatives.)

PUBLISHERS' CODES—ADDRESS BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I offer for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a brief address by Walter Lippmann on the subject of Publishers' Codes.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 17, 1935]

LIPPMANN ADVISES PUBLISHERS TO REFUSE CODE WHEN N. I. R. A. ENDS—EVEN THE BEST MAY PAVE WAY FOR CENSORSHIP AND SHOULD NEVER BE ACCEPTED, HE SAYS AT BOOK ASSOCIATION LUNCHEON; REVIEWER CRITICIZES CRITICS

Even the best of codes may pave the way for a bad one, and hence should never be accepted by any publisher who values the freedom of the press, Walter Lippmann said in a speech before the luncheon of the National Association of Book Publishers, following their annual meeting yesterday in the Ambassador Hotel. He urged them to ask for no code and to accept none when the N. I. R. A. expires next June.

"They tell us", he said, "that General Johnson and Mr. Richberg and the President are devoted to the freedom of the press and have no desire to censor it. But they are not immortal, and I do not know, and you do not know, who are going to be in the seats of authority 10, 20, or 50 years hence. The freedom of the press is much too important a thing to be dealt with on the notion that intelligent and well-intentioned men happen at this moment to be in power in Washington."

SEES PATH TO CENSORSHIP

Censorship of the press through a code could be accomplished, he said, by imposing high scales of wages and building requirements that would force the radical publishers, usually the less wealthy ones, out of business. Or, if the Government wished to muzzle the conservative press, he added, this could be done by regulation of advertising and "a few other aspects of the publishing business."

Christopher Morley, toastmaster at the luncheon, remarked that in his opinion the question of freedom of the press was settled if the publisher "prints the same thing exactly as the author wants it", and that "conditions of sale have nothing to do with freedom of the press."

"There is also another right to be considered", he said, "and that is the right of the small bookseller to make a living."

Clifton Fadiman, book reviewer of the New Yorker and connected with the publishing firm of Simon & Schuster, launched a vigorous attack on the growing tendency toward "grand chamism" in literary criticism—the growth of personal prestige to the point where a single man's words may make the success of a book or ruin its possibilities.

"The reviewer", he said, "has assumed far too great importance in the life of book publishers. I deplore the tendency to publish with certain reviewers in mind."

Publishers should remember, Mr. Fadiman added, "that there is the story of the boy who cried 'Wolf!' too often, and that it is possible also for a reviewer to 'go quietly mad' once too often."

CALLS CRITICS SPINELESS

Mr. Fadiman said that the atmosphere in relations between publishers and reviewers should be "one of healthy suspicion" and that, like some other things, such relations were "most pure when slightly strained." As an example of the dangers of too much friendliness between publisher and critic, he cited the present state of English criticism, which he said had become "almost completely spineless."

Archibald MacLeish, former Pulitzer prize winner in poetry, a member of the staff of Fortune, told the assembled publishers that the very element that made the success of publishers and critics—timeliness—was the thing it was most necessary for a writer to avoid if he wished to do great work.

He suggested that perhaps publishers might be more successful in unearthing works of genius "in the occasional slim volumes of some young poets rather than in all the catalogs and all the blurbs of their competitors."

Mr. MacLeish said that it was his opinion that there was too much talk of "the revolution" in contemporary writing and not enough real revolution. The distinction between the two, he explained, was that "the revolution" was the political and economic revolution produced by class struggle, while "revolution" was simply the progression of ideas, the work usually of poets, which would produce their political and social effects only after a century or more.

LIPPMANN'S ADDRESS

The complete text of Mr. Lippmann's address follows:

"Mr. Norton has asked me once or twice to give him a title for what I am going to say. I haven't thought of one yet. But I can describe my general intentions. Having had an excellent luncheon with the publishers I propose to bite the hands that have fed me by arguing that since the summer of 1933 the publishers of books, magazines, and newspapers have exhibited an alarmingly inadequate understanding of what it means to protect the freedom of the press and that they have gravely compromised the basic principles of that freedom.

"I refer to their acceptance of N. R. A. codes and their willingness to permit the Federal Government to put the Blue Eagle on their publications as a sign of approval. For I take the position—and I am going to argue it here today—that publishing should never have been put under N. R. A., that the administration should never have been permitted, without a struggle carried right up to the Supreme Court, to impose codes, and that publishers should never have accepted them voluntarily.

FREEDOM OF THE PRESS

"What are these codes? They are Federal laws enforceable in the Federal courts. Under these laws the Federal Government undertakes to regulate hours, wages, the relations between publisher, editor, and writer, the costs of production, the method of distributing what is written. These are specific Federal regulations applying to different sorts of publications. Now, I say that when publishers and editors and writers accept the principle that a government authority may make specific laws for books, magazines, and newspapers, they have accepted an evil precedent which threatens the freedom of the press. They have admitted that the government may regulate the economic basis of the press, and if a government can regulate the economic basis of the press, it can regulate what is printed by the press.

PRECEDENT FOR MISCHIEF

"They tell us that General Johnson and Mr. Richberg and the President are devoted to the freedom of the press and have no desire to censor it. I believe that. I have never doubted it. But they are not immortal, and I do not know and you do not know who are going to be in the seats of authority 10, 20, or 50 years hence. The freedom of the press is much too important a thing to be dealt with on the notion that intelligent and well-intentioned men happen at this moment to be in power in Washington. It has to be guarded, as the most sacred part of our heritage and the foundation of all our other liberties, on the presumption that sometime or other, in the midst of a crisis we cannot now foresee, attempts will be made to destroy the freedom of the press. The liberties of man are not yet so secure that they do not have to be defended with the utmost vigilance. And I say that if ever the attempt is made to destroy the freedom of the press these codes will furnish the means to do it and the precedent by which it can be done.

EXAMPLES OF DANGER

"Let me tell you how it can be done. Suppose you wished to throttle the publication of progressive and radical books, magazines, and newspapers. You would recognize that by and large their publishers are the economically weaker members of the publishing business. On the whole they pay lower salaries; they are published in poorer buildings. All right. With the help of a clever lawyer and an architect it would be no great trick at all to put building regulations into a code which was ostensibly designed to protect newspaper workers from fire and from disease, but would in fact, if enforced, make it impossibly expensive for many small, weak publishers to exist. It would then be possible to set a scale of wages and hours which only the richest, which is likely to mean the more conservative, publishers could afford.

"On the other hand, with the help of experts, it would be feasible to throttle the conservatives almost as effectively if you will let me write codes to regulate advertising and a few other aspects of the publishing business. Give me the right to regulate the economic basis of publishing and I'll regulate publishing, perhaps not quite so effectively as Dr. Goebbels, but effective enough.

"You may say these things won't happen. It is enough for me that they could happen. If someone stood up in Washington and said, 'Let us have a press censor; he will be very liberal * * *' would you agree to that? You would not. Well, I say you should not have agreed to let the Government impose codes regulating the business of publishing, no matter how confident you felt that the codes would not now interfere with the freedom of the press. A good censor is still bad, because you know that he might easily be followed by a bad censor. By the same token, a good code is bad because it might easily become a bad code.

CODES ARE SPECIFIC LAWS

"I know the arguments of those who defend the codes. Aren't publishers business men, they say, and why, as business men working for profit, should they escape regulation that applies to other business men? Those who use this argument have never, I believe, understood the real point at issue. The codes are specific laws applying to specific industries. And they can, therefore, be manipulated—and, in fact, have been manipulated in many cases—to promote particular interests and policies for that industry.

"I have no objection, of course, to general laws which apply to all business men, publishers included. I am not arguing that publishers should be exempt from, let us say, a child-labor law; I am arguing that the Government, and especially executive officials, shall not make a particular law applying to newsboys. I am not suggesting that publishers should not have to obey labor laws. I am objecting to special labor laws for the publishing industry. The point is important. I hope I can make it clear. Perhaps this illustration will make it clearer. There is no reason why publishers should not pay taxes just like any other business men. But there would be the greatest possible objection to a special tax on publications. For a special tax could be used in the future, as it has been in the past, to control what is published and therefore to destroy the freedom of the press.

"I am afraid I have gone beyond my allotted time. I apologize, but this thing has been in my mind since the N. R. A. was launched and, like Dr. Condon, I have to talk. I am worried by the ease with which men, who have devoted their lives to fighting for freedom of speech, have lost their bearings in this affair.

SHOULD ACCEPT NO CODE

"Surely, the only position for publishers, editors, and writers to take is that they are subject to the general laws of the land, within the guaranties of the Constitution, and that for the rest they will ask no favors from the Government. They will accept no favors from the Government. They will recognize no authority in the Government to regulate them specifically.

"And that, therefore, when the N. I. R. A. expires in June they will ask for no code and accept none, and that they are removing the Blue Eagle from their publications because the right to publish in America is guaranteed by the Constitution, and no license, no decoration, no official stamp of any kind is necessary, is desirable, is consistent with the American tradition of the freedom of the press."

At their business meeting in the morning the National Association of Book Publishers elected W. W. Norton, president of W. W. Norton & Co., Inc., president of their association for 1935. Other officers elected were D. L. Chambers, of Bobbs-Merrill Co., first vice president; Curtis W. McGraw, of the McGraw-Hill Book Co., second vice president; Howard C. Lewis, of Dodd, Mead & Co., third vice president; Richard J. Walsh, of the John Day Co., fourth vice president; Stanley M. Rinehart, of Farrar & Rinehart, secretary; and Thayer Hobson, of William Morrow & Co., treasurer.

Editorial problems, publishers' relations with book sellers, librarians, and book manufacturers, and activities of the association's credit bureau during the last year were among the subjects discussed at the business meeting, which was closed to the press.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA

[Mr. GUFFEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the inaugural address of George H. Earle, Governor of Pennsylvania, delivered on Jan. 15, 1935, at Harrisburg, Pa. The address appears in the RECORD, p. 624, as part of the remarks of Hon. HENRY ELLENBOGEN, a Representative from Pennsylvania.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. A. C. Millar, editor of the Arkansas Methodist, Little Rock, Ark., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, we rejoice in the privilege of calling Thee our Father. We thank Thee for the multiplied mercies and blessings we have received. We have had our troubles, our trials, our tribulations; and yet, in spite of all these things, we have been the objects of Thy mercy and Thy love.

We come with humble hearts and ask Thy pardon for our individual and collective sins. We pray that Thou wouldst bless each one of us. We pray Thy blessings upon our Nation, that we may be a people who love and honor Thee and seek to promote righteousness in the world. We pray Thy blessings upon the President and the Congress, upon all who are in authority, that these may be men who serve not merely a human constituency but who serve Thee as far as they can understand how to serve the God of the universe.

We pray Thy especial blessing upon the individual Members of this body, that each one may seek to live a good life and may seek to follow the principles of truth and righteousness and may endeavor to meet the expectation of those who have reposed confidence in Thee. Bless us in this hour and continue to bless us, we beg. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 3410. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

RESIGNATION OF MEMBER

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 10, 1935.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I beg leave to inform you that I have this day transmitted to the Governor of Rhode Island my resignation as a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the First District of Rhode Island, to take effect at midnight tonight.

With great respect,
Your obedient servant,

FRANCIS B. CONDON.

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of title 40, sections 175 and 176, United States Code, the Chair appoints the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH] members of the House Office Building Commission to serve with himself.

AIRPLANES

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 59

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation the Committee on Military Affairs of the Seventy-fourth Congress is authorized, as a committee, by subcommittee or otherwise, to continue the investigation begun under authority of House Resolution 275 of the Seventy-third Congress, and for such purposes said committee shall have the same power and authority as that conferred upon the Committee on Military Affairs by House Resolution 275 of the Seventy-third Congress. The unexpended balance of the appropriation of $30,000 under House Resolution 284 and House Resolution 439 of the Seventy-third Congress is hereby continued for such purposes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina very kindly consulted me in regard to this resolution. I think this committee has done some good work. The gentleman from South Carolina informs me that the work is not entirely completed, however, and that there are several other matters that should be attended to in connection with this investigation. So far as I know, there is no opposition on this side against the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, after the reading of the Journal next Monday, I be allowed to address the House for 10 minutes on Two Safeguards to Free Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

"HOT OIL"—CAN CONGRESS PROHIBIT INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN PETROLEUM PRODUCED IN EXCESS OF STATE ALLOWABLES?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the subject of the petroleum industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, throughout the investigation of the petroleum industry by the Cole committee it was urged that Congress continue in force the substance of the Connally amendment—section 9 (c) of the National Industrial Recovery Act—forbidding the movement in interstate commerce of hot oil, that is, crude oil or its products produced in excess of allowables fixed by State law. So far as I recall this view was unanimously presented. State officials, majors, and independents united in advocating such legislation.

The United States Supreme Court in the Panama and Amazon cases has just held that section 9 (c), as drawn in 1933, was invalid in that it conferred upon the President the power to prohibit or not prohibit "hot oil" in his own unlimited discretion and was therefore an unconstitutional attempt to delegate legislative power. The Court said:

The Congress left the matter to the President without standard or rule, to be dealt with as he pleased. * * * If section 9 (c) were held valid, * * * Congress could at will and as to such subjects as it chooses transfer that (the law-making) function to the President.

In brief, the Court held that 9 (c), if valid, could be extended in such way as to convert a representative government into a dictatorship.

Despite this salutary reminder that the Constitution is still the supreme law of the land, it seems to be assumed, again almost without question, that if the vice of delegating unlimited power to the President were removed, Congress can nevertheless either delegate that power to be exercised within charted boundaries, or that Congress can directly prohibit the shipment of "hot oil", as defined by State law, from an oil-producing to the oil-consuming States. Bills have been presented by Senator CONNALLY and Representative DISNEY to prohibit such shipment.

Before embarking on another effort to corral "hot oil" it may be worth while for Congress and the petroleum industry generally to examine a little more critically the assumption upon which the proposed legislation rests.

Let it be understood that we are here dealing with constitutional power, rather than the question of the desirability of conserving our indispensable natural and national resources or of stabilizing a great industry. The Supreme Court will still continue as an ex post facto partner in petroleum legislation.

I therefore raise this question: Does Congress have the power to forbid the facilities of interstate commerce to petroleum, or other commodities, produced in excess of the law of the State of its production?

This question remains undecided by the Amazon-Panama decision. Justice Hughes, speaking for the majority of eight, said:

> Assuming for the present purpose, without deciding, that Congress has power to interdict the transportation of that excess in interstate and foreign commerce—

And so forth.

Justice Cardozo, who dissented, said:

> There could surely be no question as to the validity of an act whereby carriers would be prohibited from transporting oil produced in contravention of a statute, if in the judgment of the (Interstate Commerce) Commission the practice was demoralizing the market and bringing disorder and insecurity into the national economy.

To this observation of Justice Cardozo it may be pointed out that in using the words "in contravention of a statute" he does not state explicitly whether he means a Federal or a State statute, although he probably meant the latter, nor is it plain that he had considered the broader implications of the question to which I now advert. In any event, from Justice Hughes' language it is clear that the Court did not decide whether Congress may prohibit the movement of oil denominated as "hot", not by its own law, but by the law of a State.

The question is: Does legislation of this general character amount to a regulation of interstate commerce by the State and not by the National Government? If so, is it valid? Can Congress delegate its exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce to a State? Can it consent to the States exercising that power?

Here is an oil-producing State. It determines or confers upon its State officials the power to determine how much oil shall be produced in that State and to brand all oil produced in excess of that determination as contraband. Congress says the contraband shall not leave that State. This, of course, denies to the other States and the oil consumers of the Nation the right to obtain and use that excess oil, whatever the amount may be, as fixed by the oil-producing State. The oil-producing State does not act in the national interest or from a national viewpoint. It acts in its own interest. It acts to conserve its natural resources. It acts also to raise the price of oil and thus benefit its own citizens. One month it may produce and ship to the oil-consuming States 500,000 barrels; the next month 600,000; the next 300,000; the next, conceivably, none at all. Congress interdicts all oil in excess of this fluctuating allowable, and does so in advance.

It is clear from this that the State actually determines from month to month the amount of oil that enters interstate commerce. Is this a regulation of commerce? Congress, representing the Nation and the national as opposed to a local interest, exercises no discretion in the matter of how much that amount shall be. It handcuffs itself to the State. Congress is the tail. The State is the dog. The dog wags the tail. Whatever the State does or may do, Congress ratifies in advance. Congress, in effect, transfers to the State the determination of how much oil shall enter interstate commerce.

Is this an unconstitutional exercise by the State of the power to regulate commerce among the several States? Is it an unconstitutional surrender by Congress of its power to regulate that commerce?

These are questions of far-reaching importance. They go much further than the immediate situation. They go also, it seems to me, to the matter of the much-discussed State compacts. If one State cannot regulate the amount of oil that flows in interstate commerce, can a group of States by compact regulate that amount? Can Congress consent to such regulation even before it is made or known?

Could one, or a group of oil-producing States, in some future time when oil runs short, limit its or their production to an amount sufficient only for their own citizens? It is easy to say that in such case Congress would repeal its interdiction so that oil might flow to the other States. But, in any event, we are dealing here with a supposed power of a State—with the aid of Congress—not only to conserve its petroleum but also to raise the price of petroleum and thus levy tribute upon the oil consumers of the Nation. (We assume that supply and demand still have some relationship to price!)

Perhaps no State would ever yield to that temptation. But we are dealing here with power, not policies; and questions of power, as Chief Justice Marshall once said, "Do not depend on the degree to which it may be exercised" (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 419). And a century later Justice McKenna in Heisler against Thomas Colliery Co., Two Hundred and Sixtieth United States, page 245, said:

> The action of a State as a regulation of interstate commerce does not depend upon the degree of interference; it is illegal in any degree.

However ingenious we may be in our efforts to permit the States in effect, if not in law, to regulate interstate commerce in petroleum, we may yet find it necessary to amend the Constitution of the United States before that is done. We still have a Supreme Court, as we were reminded the other day.

Let us discuss some of the cases which point both ways—and the historical facts which led to the inclusion of the interstate-commerce clause in the Federal Constitution.

Why did the States in 1787 enter into that more perfect union under which we live? There were many reasons, of course, but according to Chief Justice Marshall:

> It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress—

Not by the States. Brown against Maryland. Marshall was a contemporary of the events of which he spoke. In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1) Judge Johnson said:

> If there was any one object riding over every other in the adoption of the Constitution, it was to keep the commercial intercourse among the States free from all invidious and partial restraints.

Under the Confederation the restraints on the free flow of commerce among the Thirteen States were many and vexatious. Nearly every State erected tariff walls against its sisters. Each tried to build up its own economy at the expense of the others. And it may be doubted whether any factor has contributed as much toward building this Nation as the fact that commercial intercourse among the States has been kept free from restraints imposed by each State upon the others. As a result each State has not only had a free national market for its own goods but in turn has been able to buy what it cannot itself produce wherever it could buy cheapest. In other words, each State has had the benefit of the low producing costs of the other States. This has constantly lowered the cost of goods to every American citizen and thus given a greater measure of general prosperity than any other nation ever achieved. All this is commonplace. One State grows cotton and buys wheat. Another makes automobiles and buys gasoline.

Now, when the States surrendered to the new Government under the Constitution the power which they previously held to regulate commerce, is it to be supposed that they intended the grantee of that power—Congress—to use it or permit it to be used by a sister State to build up its own industry—whether petroleum, coal, wheat, automobiles, or cotton—at the expense of the others? When a State gave up its power to exclude the goods of other States in exchange for a surrender by a sister State of a like power to exclude the goods of the first, can it be assumed that Congress was to prohibit what the States gave up the right to prohibit?

I know we are dealing here with a great and irreplaceable natural resource; but if the theory of Congressional acquiescence in State restrictions is sound in law, it must apply to all commodities.

The four or five automobile States could be equally permitted in law to limit the production of automobiles and thus raise the price and build up their economy at the expense of the rest. This would cause the other States to make their own automobiles—regardless of higher cost—and thus diminish the standards of living of the entire Nation.

To prevent such possibilities the States went to great lengths in writing the fundamental law of the Nation. They conferred upon Congress the exclusive power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. They provided that no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State, that no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce—by the National Government—to the ports of one State over those of another, that no vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another, that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States, that no State shall grant letters of marque and reprisal or without the consent of Congress lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, or lay any duty on tonnage, or enter into any agreement or compact with another State and that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

It must be clear that it was the intention that all citizens and their property and business should be free and equal, so far as the law of the Union could make them so.

In West v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. (221 U. S. 229) it was held that a State could not prohibit the transportation outside the State of natural gas produced within the State. The Court said:

> If States have such power * * * Pennsylvania might keep its coal, the Northwest its timber, the mining States their minerals. And why not the products of the field be brought within the principle? * * * No State, by the exercise of, or by the refusal to exercise, any or all of its powers, may substantially discriminate against or directly regulate interstate commerce or the right to carry it on.

Similarly, in Pennsylvania v. West Virginia (262 U. S. 535), West Virginia passed a law to conserve to her own citizens her supply of natural gas which it was believed was being exhausted. The law was held unconstitutional as a State regulation of interstate commerce.

In two earlier cases a somewhat different view was taken. Geer v. Connecticut (161 U. S. 519) involved a statute forbidding shipment out of the State of wild game. It was upheld on the ground that wild game belongs to the State, which may confine the use of such game to those who own it, the people of the State. This was distinguished in West against Kansas on the ground that natural gas when reduced to possession becomes the property of the landowner—not of the State—and the subject of interstate commerce.

In Hudson County Water Co. v. McCarter (209 U. S. 349), it was held that New Jersey could prohibit the sale of water out of the State. This theory did not appeal to the court in the later cases involving natural gas.

These cases involve State restrictions on the outbound movement of commodities. The liquor cases, to which I shall refer, involve restrictions on inbound movement.

It may be said that West against Kansas and Pennsylvania against West Virginia did not have congressional sanction and that with it, the case might be different. This raises the question whether Congress can consent to a limitation on interstate commerce imposed by a State—at least as to commodities which do not run the gantlet of police power such as liquor. And with respect to the latter it may be pointed out that the prohibition extends uniformly to all liquor; not some liquor; in other words, to the commodity itself, not to the amount of the commodity.

Since the Passenger Cases (7 How. 282) it is generally accepted doctrine that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce is "immediately exclusive"—that a State cannot regulate such commerce on the theory that, in any particular case, Congress by inaction or silence can be supposed to have given consent. This doctrine leads to the conclusion that the congressional power to regulate cannot be delegated to the States any more—let us say—than it could unconditionally delegate it to the President as was attempted in the Amazon-Panama cases.

In 1890 Congress passed the Wilson Act to subject intoxicating liquor to State law when brought within the State, though still in the original package. This was held constitutional in Re Rohrer (140 U. S. 545). The Court said:

> It does not admit of argument that Congress can neither delegate its own powers nor enlarge those of a State. * * * By the adoption of the Constitution the ability of the several States to act upon the matter solely in accordance with their own will was extinguished, and the legislative will of the general Government substituted. * * * In enacting the law in question Congress has not attempted to delegate the power to regulate commerce * * * or to grant a power not possessed by the States, or to adopt State laws. It has taken its own course and made its own regulation, applying to these subjects of interstate commerce one common rule, whose uniformity is not affected by variations in State laws in dealing with such property. * * * Congress did not use terms of permission to the State to act, but simply removed an impediment to the enforcement of the State laws in respect to imported packages in their original condition, created by the absence of a specific utterance on its part. It imparted no power to the State not then possessed, but allowed imported property to fall at once upon arrival within the local jurisdiction.

Before the Wilson Act was passed, two cases, Bowman v. Railroad (125 U. S. 465) and Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S. 100), had held that the States could not forbid the import of liquor. In those cases there were expressions that Congress might grant express permission or allow the States to do so.

When it was found that the Wilson Act original packages were leaking, the Webb-Kenyon Act was passed, in 1913, over the veto of President Taft, who held it was an unconstitutional transfer of congressional power. The act was upheld in Clark Distillery Co. v. Western Maryland Ry. Co. (242 U. S. 311). The Court said:

> The sole claim is that the act was not within the power of Congress to regulate because it submitted liquors to the control of the States by subjecting interstate commerce in such liquor to present and future State prohibition, and hence in the nature of things was wanting in uniformity. * * * The argument as to delegation to the States rests upon a mere misconception. It is true the regulation which the Webb-Kenyon Act contains permits State prohibitions to apply to movements of liquor from one State to another, but the will which causes the prohibitions to be applicable is that of Congress, since the application of State prohibition would cease the instant the act of Congress ceased to apply.

It must, I think, be admitted that the language just quoted has some bearing upon the proposed redraft of section 9 (c). In distinction, however, it may be pointed out that in that case the State prohibition, as well as the auxiliary prohibition of Congress, was absolute and uniform as to the thing prohibited. It prohibited the commodity itself, not its amount. It interdicted an article, not a quantity. It did not sanction a part, and condemn another part of the same thing.

Whether this has legal significance I do not know. But in any event the Supreme Court was then dealing with a commodity—intoxicating liquor—as to which there was no question the State might prohibit in its entirety.

In the oleomargarine cases the courts have gone a long way to prevent commerce in an article that might be easily and fraudulently palmed off as something that it is not. But in Schallenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S. 1), the Court said: "A lawful article of commerce (oleomargarine) cannot be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it is manufactured or grown."

This brings us to the question whether oil made hot by State law is a lawful article of commerce while admitting that what might be called cold oil is clearly lawful.

Here the analogy of the stolen automobile suggests itself. The Dyer Act punishing the transportation of stolen motor vehicles was upheld in Brooks v. U. S. (267 U. S. 432). The Court said:

> Congress can certainly regulate interstate commerce to the extent of forbidding and punishing the use of such commerce as an agency to promote immorality, dishonesty, or the spread of any evil or harm to the people of other States from the State of origin. In doing this it is merely exercising the police power, for the benefit of the public, within the field of interstate commerce.

The Court then discussed the cases involving diseased cattle, lottery tickets, prize-fight films, white slaves, adulterated articles, and so forth. In these cases the use of interstate commerce had contributed to the accomplishment of harmful results to the people of other States. The child-labor case, Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S. 251), was described as "really not a regulation of interstate commerce but a congressional attempt to regulate labor in the State of origin, by an embargo on its external trade."

Is "hot oil" in the same category as a stolen automobile? Neither is harmful in itself, like a tubercular cow. The sale, however, of a stolen automobile in another State is a fraud upon the innocent purchaser. His money is obtained on a false pretense. He acquires no title to what he buys. "Hot oil", however, when it moves into another State either in its crude or refined form, is so incapable or difficult of identification as such that to deny a good title to its purchaser would place an almost insufferable burden upon commerce in petroleum. The question may therefore still be asked whether the movement of "hot oil" is apt to accomplish a harmful result to the people of other States than the State of origin. Neither the Connally or Disney redraft of 9 (c) goes so far as to forfeit the interest of the innocent purchaser. He, therefore, cannot receive a harmful result. The thing condemned by their drafts is transportation or commerce not purchase and use.

If Congress, under Hammer against Dagenhart, cannot regulate labor in the State of origin, can it directly or indirectly regulate production in the State of origin even though the State, like Barkis, is willing?

The Champlin Refining Co. v. Corporation Commission of Oklahoma (286 U. S. 210) did not hinge upon the interstate-commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

The Court said, in upholding the State proration law, that it—

> Applies only to production and not to sales or transportation of crude oil or its products. Such production is essentially a mining operation and therefore is not a part of interstate commerce even though the product obtained is intended to be and in fact is immediately shipped in such commerce.

Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co. (260 U. S. 245) is a case to which I have already referred. It is of very great interest not only as a sidelight on petroleum but with reference to other natural resources such as are now under consideration by Congress and the National Resources Board.

In that case Pennsylvania provided that anthracite but not bituminous coal should be "subject to a tax of 1½ percent of the value thereof when prepared for market." The attorneys general of the States of New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Delaware—anthracite-consuming States—filed briefs. It was alleged that Pennsylvania had a practical monopoly of anthracite coal, and that 80 percent of its production was shipped to other States, which constitute its major market.

It was therefore claimed that the imposition of this additional tax on anthracite alone would be passed on to the consumer and thus permit—

> The holder of a natural monopoly to use the channels of interstate commerce to tax persons in other States to the extent of about $6,000,000 a year, of which about $3,000,000 will be paid by the protesting States.
> Outward movement is as much within the protection of the commerce clause as inward movement. * * * If the tax be upheld, it is inevitable that every State which possesses natural resources essential to other States will impose similar taxes, in order to make those which it cannot directly and constitutionally tax contribute to its exchequer through the channels of commerce. Indeed, several States may combine (interstate oil compacts) so as to create absolute monopolies by the enactment of uniform laws exacting taxes similar to this. Such a situation would bring back the commercial conflicts between the States which the commerce clause was enacted to prevent.

Reliance was placed on cases holding void, as to documents used in interstate commerce, State stamp-tax laws—United States v. Hroslef (237 U. S. 1), and so forth.

The Court disposed of these contentions and held the act valid as not infringing on the power to regulate commerce or as a denial of due process as an unreasonable classification for tax purposes:

> A tax upon articles in one State that are destined for use in another State cannot be called a regulation of interstate commerce, whether imposed in the certainty of a return from a monopoly existing, or in the doubt and chances because of competition. The contention is—> that the products of a State that have, or are destined to have, a market in other States are subjects of interstate commerce, though they have not moved from the place of their production or preparation.

Said the Court—

The Court held, rightly, it seems, that this drove the old gray mare too far. It said:

> The reach and consequences of the contention repel its acceptance. If the possibility, or, indeed, certainty of exportation of a produce or article from a State determines it to be in interstate commerce before the commencement of its movement from the State, it would seem to follow that it is in such commerce from the instant of its growth or production, and in the case of coals, as they lie in the ground. The result would be curious. It would nationalize all industries; it would nationalize and withdraw from State jurisdiction and deliver to Federal commercial control the fruits of California and the South, the wheat of the West and its meats, the cotton of the South, the shoes of Massachusetts, and the woolen industries of other States at the very inception of their production or growth; that is, the fruits unpicked, the cotton and wheat ungathered, hides and flesh of cattle yet on the hoof, wool yet unshorn, and coal yet unmined, because they are, in varying percentages, destined for and sure to be exported to States other than those of their production.

The Court concluded that the power of Pennsylvania to tax continued to, and ceased when commodities commenced their final movement for transportation from the State of their origin to that of their destination. The fact that the coal was to be taxed on its value when ready for shipment did not cause the situation of the coal to be changed and as moving in interstate commerce when it is plainly not so moving.

The obvious effort, however, of Pennsylvania to impose a tax on its consumers of anthracite in other States, while legally permissible, recalls an observation by Alexander Hamilton in Thirty-first Federalist:

> It should not be forgotten that a disposition in the State governments to encroach upon the rights of the Union is quite as probable as a disposition in the Union to encroach upon the rights of State governments.

This paper will justify the labor of its preparation if it recalls once more the wisdom of the fathers in making commerce among the States free from State control and the ever-present danger of whittling that wisdom away. We may, and do, freely grant the desirability of conserving a great natural resource while we at the same time recognize the temptation to use conservation as an excuse for stabilization, for building up profits in one State at the cost of the other States. Conservation is primarily a national problem, and danger may lie in Congress tying itself too tightly to a solution of that problem that is apt to be too greatly influenced by local and selfish considerations.

These observations are submitted to the Congress and the petroleum industry for their consideration in the hope that further discussion may clarify the questions involved.

Congressmen sometimes rush in where judges fear to tread.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, at this time I desire to call the attention of the House very briefly to important headlines carried in every metropolitan paper this morning. It seems to me this is a subject that is of equal importance and of equal interest to the majority as well as to the minority Members of the Congress. I can say that so far as I am concerned as a Member of this body, I was considerably disturbed. It seems to me this announcement materially affects the future of our present form of government and whether or not we are to continue to have three separate and distinct branches of Government, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial.

The immediate article to which I shall refer appeared in the New York Tribune, but practically the same matter was carried in all of the other morning papers:

Industry to tell views; new-deal open door to opinions of business is created by extension of Advisory Planning Council.

Now comes the direct quotation given by Secretary Roper which, I expect, has the approval of the administration. I quote:

Any business man or organization desiring to be heard on any piece of pending or proposed legislation may get a hearing through this council.

According to the present plan, and set-up, and policy of the Federal Government hearings on pending legislation for 150 years have been carried on before the committees having jurisdiction over that legislation. It seems to me that that is the proper forum for the business men of the country or any other man who has any suggestion relative to pending legislation to present his views. That is certainly the place unless we are going entirely to change our present procedure as far as legislative matters are concerned, and adopt in its place a complete form of government under commissions. This policy has always been opposed by both major political parties, and this announcement at this time from a high source in the present administration indicates to me that the administration intends to further take unto itself all the constitutional rights of the legislative branch of the Government.

Further quoting:

Information and suggestions communicated to it will be passed along to the subcommittee for consideration and later communicated to different Members of the Cabinet. They, in turn, will route the suggestions through whatever channels they deem fit.

Now, it seems to me that that is a definite statement that as far as this supercommission is concerned they do not intend to give any consideration whatever to the legislative branch of the Government. They mention the Cabinet, a part of the executive, but do not even mention the legislative. Therefore, what other deduction can we make from that statement except Congress will be ignored more fully in the future than this administration is doing at present?

I am wondering how the elected Members of the majority look on such an astounding suggestion from the executive branch of the Government?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would wait just a minute.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I should like to ask the gentleman a question on that particular point.

Mr. SNELL. What is the question?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Is there anything in the statement made by the Secretary that precludes any committee of Congress from considering legislation that may come before such committee?

Mr. SNELL. The statement is made definitely to the effect that they will put it wherever they see fit and indicates it will be referred to one of its own subcommittees, or to the Cabinet, but no mention whatever of the legislative branch, which is created under the Constitution for the express purpose of legislating. I maintain, if you are going to carry out that idea and we are going to have supercommission government, the American House of Representatives and Senate have no further functions to perform. I have nothing to criticize as far as the members of that commission are concerned. They are all high-grade men; but if they are going to decide the policies of this Government in regard to all legislative matters, I maintain they should be elected to the House of Representatives or to the Senate from their individual districts and then they will have the opportunity of doing that work. [Applause.]

I expect to make some further remarks later and speak more fully along this line, but I want to say here and now that so far as I am concerned the continued supercommission form of government is not going to go unchallenged. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I agree in part with what the gentleman says. Of course, he is reading from the mouthpiece of the opposition.

Mr. SNELL. Regardless of the paper, I read a direct quotation supposed to come from Secretary of Commerce Roper.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not like to see the minority leader get so alarmed about the fear that Congress is ever going to delegate to anybody its legislative power.

Mr. SNELL. May I say that if you continue along the line you have gone the last 2 years, you will not have to go very much farther before you have delegated all of the power. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is a criticism that is always used by the opposition. It was used during the 8 years the gentleman's party was in control.

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to yield to the gentleman in order to make a long speech. If we went as far as the present administration, or even ever suggested going as far as your administration is now going, I want to apologize now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have never acquired the habit of putting my own speeches in the RECORD, but it is just a coincidence that last evening I spoke before the Bar Association of Baltimore County on the very same subject the distinguished minority leader has discussed.

During the 10 years I served under the Republican administration, and it was very much under, I heard no complaint from the Republican side as to the great menace of "delegation of congressional power", and I recall many a day when all the Republican leaders of the House spent their time at the other end of the avenue or in some department getting ideas as to legislation. They had no objection then. They were going down town every day in order to get ideas as to what should be passed here, and may I say further that there never was a party in power that brought in here so much legislation and passed it under the suspension of the rules as the Republican Party did when they were in power.

Now, I do not mind the opposition press criticising Congress for relinquishing its rights. I expect that from the New York Herald Tribune and the Chicago Tribune, I expect it from the minority, but I know that the public today has confidence in the Democratic Congress. They know their Members are sent here direct from the people and that there is no danger that the fundamental conceptions of our Government are going to pass out of existence. One hundred and fifty years from now we will still have a Congress of the United States functioning here and passing legislation, and no executive or any other branch is going to interfere.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman knows that the minority leader's last President for 4 years never had an idea of his own. He never had a constructive policy of his own. He never had a program of his own. He left everything to commissions, and every time he wanted to do something he appointed a commission and spent a year or 18 months investigating before his commission would give him an idea.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What annoys some Members of the minority is that for 8 years in the White House they built up a reputation of complete silence. That was their only claim to fame—Silent Cal and Silence. Now we have a man in the White House who is brave enough to speak up and talk with his own American people who elected him, and the Republicans just cannot understand how that could possibly happen. Whenever the distinguished President transmits to Congress some ideas for the consideration of the Congress that is such a new venture, such a novelty to the minority that they talk about dictatorship. This is contrasted with the silent men that they had down there. If they had not been so silent, we would not be in the position we are today, because it was their silence for 4 or 5 years that threw us into the greatest abyss that any nation has ever been in, so we are not worried about this minority attack in reference to legislation being perfected somewhere else.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] stirred up a tempest in a teapot about nothing. The various departments investigating these matters which business men have brought to them have nothing to do with committee hearings on proposed legislation. No matter what these department heads may do, and no matter to whom these things may be referred, any legislation, before it can come to the floor of this House, must go to a committee, and if the committee desires to do so it may hold hearings on the proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Exactly.

Mr. RANKIN. I am surprised at my friend the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. It is all right to laugh about it, but the statement is definitely made, "If the people want to have any expression or present their ideas on pending legislation", and so forth. I claim that if they want to present their ideas on pending legislation they should go before the appropriate committee of the Congress, as has always been done.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, the gentleman from New York knows that that is just what they have got to do.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. BULWINKLE. That is exactly the point I made.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Some of the Members who have been here for years will recall that when important legislation was before this House, especially that which came from other sources, we had three or four Presidential secretaries and Cabinet members on the floor here to see that such legislation went through. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous vote of the Committee on Labor, I have been instructed to come before the House and to protest to the Speaker and the Membership of this House against the referring of legislation to the Ways and Means Committee which properly belongs in the Committee on Labor.

For the past 12 years the Committee on Labor has held long, extensive hearings on old-age pension legislation. During the past 3 years the Committee on Labor has held hearings on unemployment insurance and the Committee feels, with no aspersion cast on the Ways and Means Committee, that all the brains of the House of Representatives are not necessarily confined to the Ways and Means Committee, and the members of the Committee on Labor feel that legislation affecting labor and the employees in labor in the United States should be referred to the Committee on Labor, where it properly belongs.

I have here the Lewis bill and I understand the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. DOUGHTON, has the same bill, and the title of the bill is "To alleviate the hazards of old age, unemployment, illness, and dependency; to establish a social insurance board in the Department of Labor; to raise revenue, and for other purposes."

The only thing in this entire title which sends this bill to the Ways and Means Committee is the phrase "to raise revenue."

Now, as I say, I have no desire to cast any aspersions on the Ways and Means Committee. They are all fine Members, intelligent, bright Members of the House of Representatives, but I do feel it is my duty as Chairman of the Committee on Labor to protest that after a committee has worked for 12 years on legislation that it is almost an insult to that committee to have such legislation referred to another committee at the last minute.

What applies to the Committee on Labor applies equally to other committees of the House, and I am doing this by direction of my committee and, as I say, by the unanimous vote of the committee.

I do not think it is just to the committee to work long days, many times well into the night, on legislation for the benefit of the American people and then at the last minute have it referred to another committee and have that committee obtain all the credit for 12 years of work on the part of the Committee on Labor.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I feel that the gentleman from Massachusetts should not be too severe upon the Speaker who made the reference, due to the fact that the reference was made in conformity with the rules of the House. The rules of the House specifically give exclusive jurisdiction to the Committee on Ways and Means of any bill relating to the raising of revenue.

Mr. CONNERY. I understand that, but what the Committee on Labor wants is a bill to come in here that will not necessarily send it to the Ways and Means Committee. Divide your bill up and put the legislation where it belongs and not have the Ways and Means Committee running all the affairs of the Nation. Let us have the committees function properly or let us abolish them.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts knows there is no disposition on my part to quarrel with him about this question.

Mr. CONNERY. I know that.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. But I invite the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Speaker did not make this reference. By unanimous vote of the House this message and the accompanying legislation was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CONNERY. I understand that thoroughly, and, of course, the gentleman knows, as a practical matter, how much good it would have done me to stand up here yesterday and move that the matter be referred to the Committee on Labor.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I simply invite the attention of the gentleman, as well as the House, to the fact that the House voted unanimously in making this reference.

Mr. CONNERY. We ask that the various portions of these bills be referred to the appropriate committees, and not put unemployment insurance and old-age pensions, which are directly connected with the workers of the United States, in the Ways and Means Committee by putting in the words " to raise revenue."

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. Is there anything to prevent the gentleman's committee from reporting favorably his bill to the House?

Mr. CONNERY. No.

Mr. SABATH. Why does not the gentleman do that?

Mr. CONNERY. Because we have been through that. We reported an old-age pension bill last year, which is exactly in line with what the President asked yesterday in his message and we could not get a rule from the Rules Committee.

Mr. SABATH. You would not need any rule.

Mr. CONNERY. When we have studied legislation which the President wants, do not wait until you can send it to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. SABATH. This would not delay the reporting of a bill by the gentleman's committee. The committee has plenty of time now.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I have performed my duty as requested by the committee.

[Here the gavel fell.]

ACOUSTICS OF THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

IMPROVEMENT OF AUDITION IN THE HOUSE CHAMBER

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for about 5 minutes. I ask the indulgence of Members of the House to listen to me for just a few moments on a question which has been of great interest to many of the new Members, something which I have discussed with many Members on both sides of the House, and which pertains to the bad acoustical conditions which exist here. People who have been in the House for many years agree that these conditions exist, and they agree that an improvement can be made. Many plans have been suggested. I am opposed to anything which would in any way change the appearance of this historical Chamber. My present interest is the comfort of Members of the House in order that they can more easily hear what is going on.

Being the only practical radio announcer in the House today, I became interested, and have made a 3 weeks' study of the acoustical properties of the House, and from personal investigation, personal contact with the Members, employees, and visitors, I find that we are not taking advantage of modern equipment which would bring invaluable improvements and more comfort, which would make us more efficient in our service to the people, aid our esteemed Speaker, lend more dignity to this body, and render more humane treatment to our speakers and employees, who today must yell at the tops of their voices the words in important documents, punctuated by the hammering of the Speaker's gavel, in order that we may hear.

I have talked to many Congressmen and asked them why it is when an important document is being read, when a Member is delivering an address on a matter of vital importance, there is so much confusion, so much noise, so much talking, and why Members congregate in the aisles and passageways and talk. The reply that comes to me is that they cannot hear anyway, and that they will be able to read what is going on in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in the newspapers. It is my belief that this is all unnecessary, especially with the great strides science has made in the loud-speaking equipment, and it is my belief and the belief of many who are here fresh from their campaigns in which they talked to thousands of people, that we should avail ourselves of this new humane comfort for the good of the Nation.

I could easily demonstrate on the floor of this House the ease with which this question can be solved by speaking in a natural tone, which you could never hear without a loud speaker, and then imitating the efforts of some of our Members in endeavoring to speak loudly. There are only a few men in the House today, from my observation, who are able to talk loud enough to be fully heard.

With this new speaking equipment in the House, the Speaker could control the House more easily. A microphone at the Speaker's desk, one at the Clerks' desk, one, each, at the reading tables, with invisible loud speakers installed at various places in the House, with the wiring placed in conduits under the floor and space provided for same, would correct the condition which exists here today. I am not endeavoring to give you a salesmanship talk on equipment. My remarks to the House are the result of deep study in acoustics and present conditions in the House, to which I have devoted many hours, and are the result of a conference with officials who agree with me. For instance, the President, in person, delivered an important message to us the other day. It was impossible to hear all that the President had to say, and we Members of the House had to wait for copies of the address before we were able to understand what the President was saying. On the other hand, three radio chains, the National Broadcasting Co., the Columbia Broadcasting System, and the American Broadcasting System, had their equipment installed in the House and enabled people miles away from lines of communication, without telephones, miles away from railroads, to hear every word distinctly, while we who sat here in the presence of the President, hearing his voice, seeing him in person, were unable to hear what he said.

The same thing is true with some of the great speakers who stand before us and talk on great state matters. We who are new are amazed to learn that we must sit very close to the speaker if we wish to hear what he has to say. It is not a question of defective hearing. It is a question of acoustical conditions in the Chamber and a condition which can be easily rectified by taking advantage of modern equipment.

My address here today is the result of a conference with Dave Lynn, Architect of the Capitol, and conference with the Honorable JOE BYRNS, the Speaker of the House, who realize that improvements can be made and who are glad to cooperate. It is my belief that the Architect should be given permission to make such experiments looking toward this necessary improvement.

This address is also the result of a conference with experienced radio experts of this city and the publishers of the magazine Broadcasting, who realize these conditions and who wonder why something has not been done about it. It is my belief that if these improvements were made it would be of inestimable value to our Speaker, making it easier for him to be heard and to more easily carry out the programs which have been laid down. It is also the result of conferences with Members who realize the good psychological effect this would have on the entire House, and that it would result in humane treatment to Members who come here to represent their people and who are anxious to be given all of the information that they need, and who are entitled to hear what is being said.

This House Chamber is approximately 75 years old. I join in the sentiment of Members of the House that nothing should be done to mar any historical phase of this Chamber. I am also in accord with the argument that nothing should be done in any way to mar architecturally or structurally or otherwise deface the present beauty of the House Chamber. The plan I have in mind will not do this but will merely mean the installation of appropriate equipment that will make it possible for human ears to hear what is being said.

I have been asked by various Members on both sides of the aisle whether or not the plan I have in mind will make it possible for those gentlemen in the press gallery to hear the proceedings on the floor without having to strain their ears, as they have to do now, and I have answered that that benefit would result.

While we must preserve the beauty of the artists who designed this historical Chamber 75 years ago, we must bear in mind the rapidity of the development of modern science, and, wherever it is possible, we must take advantage of modern mechanical equipment, especially when it will be of direct benefit to the people whose interests we serve.

Because I feel the great service this would render to the Government, to the House, and to the people, I plead with Members to give the Architect permission to make such experiments which would lead to the installation of improvements in this historical Chamber, in no way marring its present beauty or its historical aspects; and so, Mr. Speaker, looking toward this greatly needed improvement, I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read the following resolution:

Whereas it is the common experience of Members of the House of Representatives that their participation in the proceedings of the House and the transaction of the public business are hindered and made unduly difficult because of imperfect audition in the House Chamber; and

Whereas it is certain that the conveyance of sound in the Chamber can be greatly improved by mechanical means: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized and directed to thoroughly investigate the means of such improvement and as promptly as practicable to report to the House of Representatives the results of such investigation, his recommendations calculated to perfect the conveyance of sound in the Chamber; and the estimated cost of making such improvement.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Could a loud speaker be installed in the Press Gallery so that those gentlemen there would not have to strain their ears, as they do now, to hear the proceedings on the floor?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes; it can be done.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed resolution to which the gentleman from Nebraska refers be read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution

Whereas it is the common experience of Members of the House of Representatives that their participation in the proceedings of the House and the transaction of the public business are hindered and made unduly difficult because of imperfect audition in the House Chamber; and

Whereas it is certain that sound conveyance in the Chamber can be greatly improved by mechanical means: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized and directed to thoroughly investigate the means of such improvement and as promptly as practicable to report to the House of Representatives the results of such investigation; his recommendations calculated to perfect sound conveyance in the Chamber; and the estimated cost of making such improvement.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk has just read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we have an important appropriation bill under consideration, which must be read and passed today; hence, on behalf of the chairman of our committee, I feel I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 60

Resolved, That WILLIAM M. CITRON, of Connecticut, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing Committee of the House of Representatives on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

ACOUSTICS OF THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one moment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, the only reason that I shall speak at this moment is the fact that I, too, am a new Member. I was intensely interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN] who submitted the resolution regarding the acoustics of this room. Those of you distinguished gentlemen who have been here serving your country for many years have ceased, perhaps, to notice the difficulty with which we hear. I come here with all of the impressions that accompany every new Member of this House. I have talked to many of the new Members themselves, and they all agree with me that it would add tremendously to the respect that the public in general gives this House if we could be heard when we speak.

The President of the United States addressed this body at the beginning of this session. The magic charm of his personality, the melody of his splendid speaking voice, the intense interest of those who listened gave him a hearing that no one else could have obtained in this Chamber, crowded as it was, and yet by reason of poor acoustics you and I who sat in the back of this Chamber could not hear him. There were hundreds of citizens of the United States in these galleries, and they could not hear him. Every day that I have been here there have been many hundreds of people in the galleries from all over the United States. We are their servants, and they have a right to hear the proceedings of the House. I have talked with quite a number of them, and some of them go away with the impression that no Member of Congress can get a respectful hearing in this body. I am simply giving you the impressions of people with whom I have talked. I think it would be of great advantage to the Members of the House and of great advantage to the people of the United States if the resolution regarding the study of the acoustics of this Chamber could be given serious study by this body. [Applause.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3973) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia, and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC SCHOOLS

For personal services of administrative and supervisory officers, in accordance with the act fixing and regulating the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, approved June 4, 1924 (43 Stat., pp. 367–375), including salaries of presidents of teachers colleges in the salary schedule for first assistant superintendents, $661,800.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: On page 30, line 23, after the word "superintendents", strike out "$661,800" and insert in lieu thereof "$666,100."

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which the Clerk just read relates to the character-education program about which I spoke at some length yesterday. The increase provides for the payment of an assistant superintendent at $4,300.

The item of character education has been endorsed by the superintendent of schools. He has definitely requested that the experiments which we started a year ago might be continued. I feel confident that the members of the subcommittee have confidence in Dr. Ballou's judgment. I believe that they have confidence in the way in which he has administered the schools of the District of Columbia. The suggestion has been made that this character-education program could be carried on by giving the work of character education over to the group of teachers and associates presently employed as regular teachers. Dr. Ballou is an expert in education. He commands the respect of educators not only of the District but of the whole country. I believe this body should follow his suggestions so long as they come within reasonable bounds, and it is my conviction that this is reasonable.

The argument may be made that our taxpayers back home are going to pay for this program of character education. Let me remind the members of the committee that a very considerable portion of the total cost comes from the taxpayers of the District of Columbia. In other words, the spread is about 6 to 1. This entire character-education program will cost approximately $85,000.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield.

Mr. COX. I have always been under the impression that all education was character improving in its nature. What is the distinction? Frankly, I do not know.

Mr. DITTER. The purpose of the program as inaugurated last year in the District of Columbia was to study intensely child psychology and child physiology in order that those defects which under ordinary educational processes might be latent could be discovered, and corrective measures brought in order that those defects might be cured.

Mr. COX. In other words, is it work that the regular organization could not well do?

Mr. DITTER. It is the conviction and the stated opinion of Dr. Ballou that the work cannot be carried on by the regularly assigned group of teachers.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I will be glad to yield to my distinguished friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The present amendment which the gentleman has offered is one of four which our friend intends to offer to this bill, if he is successful on this one? This one carries $4,300. The next one will carry $5,000; the third one will carry $20,340; and the next one $56,900. Then there is another one of $1,000, and if the gentleman is successful, when he gets through he will have added $87,540 to this bill. Is that not correct?

Mr. DITTER. I did not yield for a statement, but I yielded for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that not correct?

Mr. DITTER. But may I say to the gentleman from Texas that I have already anticipated his alarmist attitude and have stated to the House that the program comprehended the possible expenditure of $85,000. So I anticipated this alarmist attitude that the gentleman from Texas is presently trying to impress upon the House. I purpose in no sense to leave the House under any misapprehension. The educational program which I purpose bringing to the floor this morning provides ultimately, in this present appropriation bill, for approximately $85,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, then, the gentleman's program, if he is successful in getting this amendment passed, is to add these other items aggregating an additional $85,000.

Mr. DITTER. I have already handed to the desk, to be read at the proper time, amendments to provide for approximately $85,000, which comes within the Budget estimate.

Mr. BLANTON. That is correct, then?

Mr. DITTER. It comes within the amount which the Bureau of the Budget submitted.

Now, may I proceed, after the effort at alarming the Membership of this House by the distinguished gentleman from Texas.

I have the highest regard for my friend from Texas. I have regard for his continued and persistent effort to watch the expenditures of government. I believe he is the watchdog of the Treasury; but I believe that, only too often, the gentleman does not have a proper sense of relative values. I believe the gentleman is willing to see a considerable sum spent for some pet project of his, and absolutely ignore the demands of the school children, not only of the District of Columbia, but the school children of the country, for, mark you, this is experimental in its character. I confess that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DITTER. In just a moment. If this experiment, as a result of 3 years of continued effort, proves successful, then the school children of your district and the school children of every district in this country may benefit by the advanced program, such as has been inaugurated in the District of Columbia.

I now yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does my good friend from Pennsylvania mean to intimate to this House that the mere statement of any program he would propose here would be alarming to the House?

Mr. DITTER. No. I am afraid that my——

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the gentleman intimated, that a mere statement of his program would alarm the House.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gentleman from Texas has misunderstood my statement. I know the distinguished gentleman from Texas tries to alarm the House about possible expenditures——

Mr. BLANTON. By stating the actual facts that appear in the record.

Mr. DITTER. Which I had already previously stated to the House. Now, again, with that interruption out of the way, irrespective of party lines—and there is no partisanship in this—if you believe that the children of the District should have the advantages of psychological and physical tests that are comprehended in this program, should have the benefit of trained assistants in studying the defects that are there, latent in many instances, and the benefit of corrective measures to cure these defects, you will support this amendment and the other amendments I purpose offering for character education. Only too frequently the school programs have been hit-or-miss programs. This is an advanced program of benefit such as has been endorsed by an educator in whom every Member of this House should have confidence.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DITTER. I shall be pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. COX. Would the adoption of the other amendments, to which reference has been made, be necessary to make effective the amendment now pending?

Mr. DITTER. I believe they all hang together. I see no reason for asking for the appointment of a superintendent at $4,300 unless he has a complement of personnel in that particular division to carry out the program under his direction. If you are not in favor of the whole program, then we should certainly vote down this $4,300 request. The requests which will follow have to do with the appointment of councilors and the appointment of teachers to build up and continue the present personnel and to extend the program into the other schools.

I ask your support for the amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, our subcommittee chairman has asked me to act for him in opposing this amendment. I do not believe any schools anywhere in the United States, or even in the world, have been treated better than have the schools in Washington. We have furnished the 91,241 school children of Washington some of the finest buildings, some of the finest equipment, some of the best teachers, who have been paid the highest salaries, and who have been given more privileges and advantages than I believe exist in any other school in the country.

The superintendent of schools in Washington is paid a salary of $10,000 a year, but in Yale, in Harvard, in Columbia, in Cornell, in Princeton, in the University of Chicago there are full professorships which do not carry any such salary. If you look on page 448 of the hearings you will find that there are 136 of the Washington high-school teachers who get $3,200 a year and that there are 488 high-school teachers here who receive salaries of $2,800 a year.

At the hearings evidence was adduced showing a man who had been president of a first-class university for 26 years had during the depression taken as low as $2,700 a year and then has had to wait for his money, as shown on page 795 of the printed hearings. Not a teacher in the schools of Washington—and there are about 2,900 teachers here—has ever had to wait 1 hour for salary, and they have gotten their salaries the very minute they were due in spot cash.

I do not believe you will find a man in the United States who knows more about the school situation in Washington or the general affairs of Washington than the splendid and able chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]. He has studied the situation for years intimately and in detail.

This $85,000 item was not in the bill last year when it passed the House. It is a new idea. The bill passed the House and went to the Senate. There it was amended by a distinguished Senator, who placed this item in the bill, and upon his insistence in conference the committee allowed it to remain, as an experiment.

They made no attempt to put character education in all the schools here. They picked out 10 schools with 5,575 pupils. Remember, the total number of pupils in the Washington schools is 91,241.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Hence, even after spending this $85,000, there were 85,666 students, pupils in the Washington schools, who did not have any contact or benefit from it whatever. It was an experiment. It was tried on only 5,575 pupils in 10 schools and they were the only ones who had any benefit from it. They were 85,666 pupils who were left out in the cold.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman from Texas tell us what opinion was expressed by Dr. Ballou?

Mr. BLANTON. Dr. Ballou, of course, was in favor of it. It meant having $85,000 additional to spend.

Mr. DITTER. I am speaking of the present opinion of Dr. Ballou in regard to the continuance of this particular program.

Mr. BLANTON. Of course, Dr. Ballou is in favor of having an additional $85,000 to spend; he was in favor of the subject.

Mr. DITTER. The distinguished gentleman from Texas has commented upon Dr. Ballou's salary. Does he mean to infer that he has not confidence in Dr. Ballou's ability?

Mr. BLANTON. I have confidence in his ability. But I can get Ph. D. graduates from Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Columbia, Cornell, or the University of Chicago who are just as able and who will furnish just as good service to the schools of this city for a salary of much less than the $10,000 Dr. Ballou is getting, and they would be glad to receive such a salary.

Mr. DITTER. Just one further question.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. Please do not take up all of my time.

Mr. DITTER. Has the gentleman, with his usual energy, enthusiasm, and application to work, taken any steps toward securing the dismissal of Dr. Ballou and the substitution of one of these many, many applicants in whom he is personally interested?

Mr. BLANTON. No; certainly not. Our committee can not change the law. If we moved another one in he would get the same $10,000 a year, because the law provides that salary.

Mr. DITTER. Then, the gentleman is satisfied that Dr. Ballou should continue?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. He is about as good as any other we could get. And he is experienced here.

Mr. DITTER. The gentleman has confidence in his judgment?

Mr. BLANTON. He is as good as anyone else we could get, but I think he is overpaid.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. This is just one of the ways of proving again the fact that when we establish one of these bureaus or departments, they want all they can get?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly. Dr. Ballou wants this $85,000 to spend. It is easy to start a little bureau, and the first thing you know it has a thousand employees if Congress will provide the money to pay their salaries.

The distinguished chairman of this committee, Mr. CANNON, has passed on this matter. I hope he will be upheld.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The hearings of the committee disclose that when this subject was under consideration, my good friend from Pennsylvania asked no questions about it, offered no objections or suggestions, and apparently was not interested in the matter. If he had suggested this ought to go into the bill, we would have taken it under consideration and reached some agreement with him.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes; I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. The chairman of the subcommittee will probably recall that I reserved the right at the time the bill was being marked up with respect to the matter of character education, for my committee imprint definitely discloses that I made a memorandum of the right which I then reserved. However, let us brush aside technicalities, let us save the time of the House; let us save the time of the country and have my distinguished chairman agree to the amendment and we will go on our way without any further difficulty.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If the gentleman had made that suggestion to me in committee, we could have determined it in committee.

Mr. DITTER. But can we not do it now?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. He made no suggestion whatever in the committee. We came to this item in marking up the bill and I said to the committee, "What is the will of the committee with respect to this item?" I first called on Judge BLANTON, who said he thought it ought to be stricken. I then turned to Mr. DITTER, who was the leader of the minority, and asked if it would be agreeable with him if it was stricken out, and he said, "Yes; but I reserve the right to offer an amendment on the floor", and I said, "Is it all right to strike it out?" and he said, "Yes." That was the time to have made any proposition about retaining it, and we would have saved 1 day in this House. We would not have had this bill up in the House today. We could have taken up other pressing legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. And when the chairman discussed the matter with some very reliable teachers the gentleman from Texas was present.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. He was present and approved it. I may add that none of the teachers who appeared before us approved this expenditure. None of the representatives of parent-teachers associations who appeared before the committee, representing the parents of the pupils, favored it. All criticized it.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DITTER. If I had insisted upon it in committee and if the gentleman would have agreed to the inclusion of the item in the bill, why not agree to it now and close the discussion?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Why did not the gentleman suggest it then. We are appropriating for the schools of the District the greatest amount of money ever appropriated for the maintenance and operation of the schools in the history of the District. We are appropriating more money for the operation and maintenance of the schools of the District of Columbia per capita than is provided by any other city in the United States, and this amendment proposes to add $87,500 more for a purpose which both teachers and parents disapprove.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. There was some evidence about the boys and girls having to sign a questionnaire.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The teachers testified that the number of questionnaires and reports had greatly added to the burden of their work, without corresponding benefit to the pupils; that it was apparently an attempt to delegate to the school a function which properly belongs to the home and the church.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is one of the most amazing things that the English language is so flexible that one can discuss the issue without going to the substance or merits of the amendment proposed in this case.

There has been a change in education as there has been a change in everything else. They spent $2,500 for tallow candles when George Washington was inaugurated, and I suppose the electric-light bill would not be more than ten or fifteen dollars for the ball at the inauguration of President Roosevelt. There has been a change in industry, a change in science, and a change in education.

We cannot be content with the three R's that we once had. The science of pedagogy has changed in like degree.

I am amazed that my good friend the distinguished gentleman from Texas should be opposed to this amendment for this reason: The other day he read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from a Hearst paper which dealt with communism in this country. Communism is nothing more than the development of antisocial tendencies. What do they seek to do in character education. They seek to conserve in the children those qualities and opinions that will help to eliminate this antisocial tendency and make them better citizens. To talk about the salaries of school teachers completely begs the question and does not go to the merits of it. It is rather picayunish. Why, we used to pay the bricklayer $16 a day to build the foundation of a house. Then why kick about $300-a-month salaries for competent teachers to build the foundation of the lives of our children who will be the citizens of tomorrow?

Why drag a herring across the trail by talking about $3,200-a-year teachers, and all that sort of thing? The evidence will show that the average age of most of our criminals today is 23. Most of them are in the brackets from 18 to 19. So you see that crime, that antisocial conduct, starts early in life. This is an experiment in education seeking to deal with the conduct of children, seeking to give direction to these tendencies, so that we can get rid of the Capones and the Dillingers, and those who have been a menace to every fabric of our society.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What are the parents supposed to do about this matter of character? Do we propose to delegate to the State everything, including the making of character?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman from Wisconsin knows very well that this is supplementary to the work of the home and supplementary to the work of the church.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Is not the whole effort of this new theory of education to delegate all of these things that the parents should do to the State? This is simply an evidence of that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is nothing more than an experiment to develop the right kind of character and conduct tendencies for healthier citizenship in this country.

Mr. O'MALLEY. But where do the parents come in?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is an expenditure and experiment similar to what you would have in the Department of Commerce if they asked for $250,000 to carry on experimentation to make airplane travel safer in this country. This goes to the vitals of future citizenship, and we should not be so picayunish as to consider the matter in terms of $87,000. It is money well spent. I venture to say that the Department of Justice expended $100,000 to just chase Dillinger around the country. If we correct the tendencies in a single child that might go into the paths of error and become a social enemy, this money would be well expended. Are you going to stop experimental work in education because there seems to be something abstract and elusive about it? Do not you think we have to carry on experiments in the psychology of pedagogy as well as we do in commerce and industry and science and in all those other things that lie on the doorstep of the Government? It is money well expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for 5 minutes. I want to ask him some questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I now yield to the distinguished statesman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend heard the chairman of the committee say that when these teachers asked their superior what they should do about this character education, they were told to make talks to the children. They asked what kind of talks, and they were told: "Oh, you know how to talk to the children; go on and talk to them." Each teacher could prepare his own talk.

We have 2,900 teachers in the city of Washington. Complaints during the last 18 years have come to us that some of them are off color—are communistic in their tendencies.

If the character education permits each one of the 2,900 teachers to talk to the children as each wants to talk to them, how would character be built in the schools?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman be so kind as to inform us how many Communists we have on the teaching staff?

Mr. BLANTON. In the last 18 years I have received several complaints.

Mr. DIRKSEN. How many? Let us be specific.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that one of the teachers was suspended here once. The teacher then appealed to the American Federation of Labor and the teachers' union, and that organization forced the teaching staff to restore the teacher; and restore the salary. There have been several complaints here during the last 18 years.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Several complaints among 2,900 teachers over a period of 18 years! You will find that condition prevails in every city of this size in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. After all, there should be character teaching in the make-up of every teacher. Is not that so? Every teacher everywhere, in every school, should do his part in character building.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Quite so.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. DITTER. To answer the gentleman from Texas with regard to the communistic tendencies in the schools. With this character-education program under direct supervision, such as is provided for by Dr. Ballou, it will help root out the things that the gentleman from Texas complains about.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman knows and I know that these new-fangled ideas in education like this so-called "character education" are a lot of highbrow baloney to create some jobs for some people who are not working. Does the gentleman not think that the money might be better spent on the parents, whose duty it is to build character in their children?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would the gentleman like to go back to the dim, misty day, when we had only the three R's and do away with the advantages accruing from modern education?

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman misunderstands me. All these new theories in the last 10 years have not decreased crime, and all this trick education, this character education, has not seemed to decrease the crime rate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, the gentleman does not take into account the thousands of other factors that might enter into it. This is one of the major things to which we have given no attention before, and the gentleman knows that the crime rate has been on the increase all these years. Here is a chance for experiment in correctional methods.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What is the tax rate in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is $1.50 a hundred.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. And what is the tax rate in the gentleman's community?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I suppose about $3.50.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is twice the amount here?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, let me explain to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Does not the gentleman think the people in the District of Columbia ought to have some civic pride themselves, and raise this money?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman is not informed. The tax rate in the District of Columbia is $1.50, but that is on the full valuation. When you come to pay taxes in New York you pay on the assessed basis, which is about one-half the value.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. We have the lowest tax rate of any city in the United States, but throughout the country they pay $3.50 or $4.20 a hundred, and in the District of Columbia they only pay $1.50.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is on the full amount.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They should have some civic pride and raise this money themselves.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think it is a rank injustice to the people of the District of Columbia to constantly parade this information that the tax rate in the District of Columbia is $1.50, when, as a matter of fact, on the basis on which you are assessed in your State, and in mine, it would be $3 per hundred and not $1.50.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That would not be so in our city.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman make the observation for the benefit of the committee that the matter of the tax rate is not pertinent to the issue presently before the committee?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. DITTER. That of every dollar paid by the Federal Government $6 is matched by the taxpayers, and out of this present sum of $87,000, $6 of every $7 will be paid by the taxpayers of the District of Columbia and not by the people back home.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois does not want to misstate the facts.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No, indeed.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman's premise were correct, that the assessments were on full valuation, say, up to last year, and I do not agree with the gentleman, does not the gentleman know that in the hearings the Commissioners testified that in the last year they arbitrarily reduced the assessed values $80,000,000 and that again this year they reduced them arbitrarily $50,000,000; so that in the last 2 years they have arbitrarily reduced the assessed values $130,000,000 in the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why should they not?

Mr. BLANTON. Then the assessments are at least $130,000,000 below full valuation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has again expired.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why should there not be a decrease in the assessable amount of property? Did not the gentleman from Texas take extreme pride in coming in to the Well of this House and helping the people of the District to constantly get those reductions?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am the best friend that the Washington people have, in spite of the opposition of the newspapers.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think that is true. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield for a brief question only. I wish to use some of my time myself.

Mr. TRUAX. I am going to ask for a little time unless the gentleman answers my question. I should like to ask the gentleman and his fellow character educationists if they receive their major support from their constituents on account of the appropriations they receive for the District of Columbia or for their own representative districts?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, now let me say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] that of the thirty-eight or thirty-nine million dollars that is represented here only $5,700,000 comes out of the Federal Treasury. Is that not right?

Mr. BLANTON. That is just one item, but look at Howard University. Every dollar that is spent on Howard University is spent by the Federal Government. Look at some of the hospitals here, which benefit the District people, the money for which is furnished by the Federal Government out of other bills.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That has nothing to do with the bill under consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. I can tell the gentleman 20 different projects in the District of Columbia benefiting Washington people alone that the Federal Government finances in other departmental bills.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not at this time. Here they are paying taxes out of their own pocket, to which Uncle Sam adds $5,700,000. What for? For all this real estate that has been displaced and that is not taxable, because it is a part of the instrumentality of government. Look at the majestic buildings and the vast amount of land preempted by Uncle Sam from which the District derives no taxes. That is why we throw a lump sum into this appropriation bill. Most of it comes out of their own pockets. Now, their superintendent of education comes before the committee and says, "We should like to spend some of our own money for this character-education work that was started last year." It is their money and they ought to have some jurisdiction and authority as to how they want to spend the money. Then, I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] that this work in character education is going to be supervised by Dr. Mann, of the American Council of Education; by some professors from Columbia University; and two from Ohio State University, who have been doing experimental work in character education.

Mr. TRUAX. I wanted to bring out the fact that in Ohio schools were closing by the score prior to the meeting of the fourth session of the general assembly, which placed a sales tax of 3 percent on the backs of the common people so that the schools could reopen; yet here you want to spend $87,000 for educational experimentation and fasten it on the backs of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Because of the fact there is now some difficulty in the gentleman's State and closing of Ohio schools, the gentleman from Ohio, by way of commiseration and sympathy, surely is not going to pull the schools of the District of Columbia down rather than to raise the Ohio schools up?

Mr. TRUAX. No; I would take that $87,000 and send it back to Ohio to open up some schools instead of experimenting down here with these high-priced educators.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of Government buildings having displaced taxable property. The hearings show that last year these very Government buildings caused visitors from his district, from my district, and from all the States to spend $50,000,000 here in Washington—a bonanza for every commercial interest in Washington.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be sustained.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 33, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services of clerks and other employees, $165,140.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: Page 30, line 25, at the beginning of line 25, strike out the figures "$165,140" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$185,480."

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take the time of the Committee on this amendment other than to say that this is a further provision for the character-education program. I shall be glad to have a vote on it immediately.

Mr. BLANTON. And a part of the $87,000 extra program.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services of teachers and librarians in accordance with the act approved June 4, 1924 (43 Stat., pp. 367–375), including for teachers colleges assistant professors in salary class 11, and professors in salary class 12, $6,896,200: Provided, That as teacher vacancies occur during the fiscal year 1936 in grades 1 to 4, inclusive, of the elementary schools, such vacancies may be filled by the assignment of teachers now employed in kindergartens, and teachers employed in kindergartens are hereby made eligible to teach in the said grades: Provided further, That teaching vacancies that occur during the fiscal year 1936 wherever found may be filled by the assignment of teachers of special subjects and teachers not now assigned to classroom instruction, and such teachers are hereby made eligible for such assignment without further examination.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: Page 31, line 11, after the word "twelve", strike out the figures "$6,896,200" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$6,953,100, of which not exceeding $5,000 may be expended for compensation to be fixed by the board of education and traveling expenses of educational consultants employed in character education."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. Clearly the last paragraph of the amendment is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill and is a change in existing law. Hence the entire amendment should be stricken out, being subject to the point of order.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, instead of being technical I would prefer to have the amendment voted upon. It is part of the same educational program I stressed before. I ask for a vote on it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order, because there is no law now that permits this arrangement of compensation to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I shall submit the matter entirely to the hands of the Chair with regard to the objection on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the compensation now is fixed by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman inform the Chair what is the compensation fixed by law?

Mr. BLANTON. The compensation of all the employees is fixed by law; but this amendment would change the law and allow these officials to fix it. Therefore it is a change in existing law, and is clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is subject to the point of order on the ground that it is a change of existing law. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For purchase and repair of furniture, tools, machinery, material, and books, and apparatus to be used in connection with instruction in manual and vocational training, and incidental expenses connected therewith, $60,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago we lost from our Membership the gentleman from New York, Anthony J. Griffin, for whom I have always had the greatest respect. My respect for him was increased yesterday when I heard the gentleman from Wisconsin discussing the bonus bill, for the reason I had just received copy of a bill that Mr. Griffin had introduced into the House providing for what seemed to me to be a very sensible solution to this bonus question. In the bill it is provided that instead of handling this question as an insurance matter we go back to the original mistake that was made at the time the bonus question first came up and treat the men as though they had been paid the cash which ought to have been paid them at that time, and then pay them compound interest at the rate of 4 percent from the date of the armistice to the present time on the sum which they ought to have received in cash at that time.

This would entail an expenditure out of Federal funds at this time of approximately $1,250,000,000, or $1,000,000,000 less than the amount provided for in the two bills now before the House, namely, the Vinson bill and the Patman bill. It will treat every veteran alike, and under any bill that has been proposed so far they will not be treated alike. This will enable every veteran, even those who have borrowed on their service certificates, to get an average of approximately $171 apiece. It will enable those who have not borrowed to cash their certificates at once. It will save money to the Government and will render justice to the veterans, because it will remove the mistake that was made in the beginning of this bonus imbroglio.

It seems to me that any way we handle this bonus question, particularly if we accept the provision inflating the currency, to pay it we are going to add a burden on the Government that is not justifiable because there is no reason for doing so. If we adopt the Patman method, and start to handle this question by an inflationary step, we will shake the confidence of the people in this country in every future measure this Congress undertakes, because everyone will assume, including the business people, laborers, and everybody else, that we are starting on a program of inflation which cannot do anything at this time, it seems to me, but cause a great deal of harm.

The bonus program that we launched was the result of two things, an idealism on the part of many of the leaders of the veterans' organizations and a very selfish materialism with the administration in power at that time who desired any measure to avoid paying out cash. The veteran leaders thought it would be better to handle this by the insurance-policy method instead of by the cash method. The administration thought anything would be better than handing out cash and putting it on the tax rolls at that time.

We cannot correct this measure unless we go back, as Mr. GRIFFIN suggested in this bill (H. R. 2019), which has been referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and erase the mistake that we originally made. Assume that we pay these men what should have been paid in 1919 and then pay them compound interest from that time to the present time at the rate of 4 percent. This will clear up, it seems to me, a great many questions that we cannot settle in any other way. It will render justice to the veterans, it will save money to the Government, and it will clear up a question that is confusing everything now before Congress and which is putting every Congressman in a very embarrassing situation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay and allowances of officers and members of the Metropolitan Police force, in accordance with the act entitled "An act to fix the salaries of the Metropolitan Police force, the United States Park Police force, and the fire department of the District of Columbia" (43 Stat., pp. 174–175), as amended by the act of July 1, 1930 (46 Stat., pp. 839–841), including compensation at the rate of $2,100 per annum for the present assistant property clerk of the police department, $3,213,500.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RANDOLPH: Page 41, line 7, after the word "department", strike out "$3,213,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,280,000."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, the item as written in the bill is $3,213,500. The amendment which I offer calls for an increase of $66,500 to cover the employment of 35 privates or patrolmen at a yearly salary of $1,900 per annum.

The reason that I ask for this increase today in connection with the discussion of the District appropriation bill is because I have actually tried to look at this matter in a fair and just manner. Major Brown went before the Budget Committee and asked that there be given to him not alone the 35 privates who had been dropped from the police force in 1933 and 1934, but he also asked, in view of the alarming and distressing crime conditions in the District of Columbia, that he be given 100 additional privates. However, when the Commissioners of the District of Columbia went before the Appropriations Committee, they disregarded the request of Major Brown as to the 100 new additions to the police force and asked simply that the 25 which had been dropped in 1933 and the 10 which had been dropped in 1934 be given back to the force.

Since that time the population of the District of Columbia, I may say, has increased from 486,000 to more than a half million residents. In addition to this the Metropolitan Police area includes hundreds of residents who daily come to Washington to transact business or who are connected with business institutions within the District of Columbia. Thousands of others come to the District each week upon Government business from the States which the gentlemen of this House represent.

The great necessity is for patrolmen. We sometimes wonder why we do not always see the policemen on the streets, but this is simply because of the very nature of District of Columbia life. These men are delegated to ceremonies, to the embassies, to legations, to emergency situations, to the protection of school children, the direction of traffic during rush hours, and the like.

I feel that the 25 positions dropped in 1933, and the 10 positions dropped in 1934, a total of 35, should be restored.

I want to make this statement, and then I shall yield to the gentleman from Texas, who is my splendid friend. A compilation of policemen per square mile in 15 cities of the United States shows that Washington, D. C., has fewer policemen to the square mile than any of these comparable cities. I may say that New York City has 56 per square mile, Boston has as many as 51 per square mile, Philadelphia has 39, Newark, N. J., has 57, Chicago has 32, while the District of Columbia has but 19 men to the square mile.

I may say to the chairman of the committee that we found that in 12 cities with respect to the number of policemen to population, taking Newark, N. J., as an example—

In Newark, N. J., with a population of 473,600, they had 1,328 policemen. In Washington, with a population of 472,000, we had 1,262 policemen.

I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does my friend know how many patrolmen we have in Washington?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have about 1,400.

Mr. BLANTON. We have 1,304, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I did not mean to say patrolmen, I was referring to the entire force.

Mr. BLANTON. In addition to that we have a park police here of 76 policemen.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia may have 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend will permit me, in addition to the 1,304 patrolmen on the Metropolitan Police force, we have a splendid park police force here, one of the best in the United States, which has 76 policemen. Then we have the White House police force, which has nearly 40, and then we have the Department of Agriculture special police force, and then we have the Capitol special police force, the House Office Building special police force, and the Senate Office Building special police force.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say to the gentleman that, certainly, we have a park police, but we have the parks here, and you do not have them in your city.

We have the Capitol here, and you do not have it in your city. We also have these Government departments here, which have to be taken care of.

But that should not take us away from the question of the actual policing of Washington, D. C. We know that in December the President of the United States was in hearty accord with the crime conference called here, because he wished to strengthen the arm of the law in the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend will permit, because he is always fair, does my friend know that within the last 4 years we have furnished much money to put these traffic lights at intersections all over Washington, and we have been able to retire a number of traffic policemen and put them back on the regular force.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say to the gentleman that if he will go to Dupont Circle and see the situation existing there, regardless of traffic lights, he will know that there will have to be a subway constructed in that section. He must realize that Washington in the next 20 years is going to be a city of three-quarters of a million people. We have outgrown our swaddling clothes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would not be surprised if every person in Texas moved up here, because they have more advantages in Washington than they have in Texas and I should not be surprised if every constituent my friend has in West Virginia does not come here ultimately.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My friends in West Virginia love Washington and they like to come here, but when they do come here they want to know they are going to have protection, and I may say that the safety of the constituents who visit the gentleman is also at stake when they come here. I had a Member of the Congress tell me, in the Capitol restaurant, where I notice the gentleman eats frequently, that one of his prominent constituents had his best overcoat stolen last evening.

In closing, may I say that I believe this request is modest, in view of the alarming situation which we know, if we are honest with ourselves, actually exists here in the National Capital.

I have tried to be fair in the presentation of the amendment. I have not asked what Major Brown asked for and he is the man who is in close contact with this vital situation. I have only asked what the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, after a careful study, have asked from the Committee on Appropriations, and I leave it with the gentleman of the committee if it is not a fact, in view of the actual conditions here, that we should grant this modest request, which is not for a new group of men, but simply placing back upon the force the 35 men who were dropped in 1933 and 1934.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the Members of the House will not think the Appropriations Committees arrive at decisions without exhaustive investigation and statistical information which justify them in the decisions which they reach.

We investigated this matter very thoroughly. We investigated it both as to crime conditions in the District as compared with crime conditions in other jurisdictions and also as to the number of police in Washington as compared with the number of police per 1,000 inhabitants in other cities.

We found crime statistics for Washington were vastly less than those of the average American city. We found more policemen per thousand of population in Washington than in the average American city. We found the rate of pay of police much in excess of the average American city.

In other words, the actual statistics of police efficiency, crime conditions, and appropriations for maintenance of the police force are much more favorable to Washington than to the average American city.

We found—and our information is secured from the official reports of the United States Department of Justice—that only two cities of the United States have more police per capita than Washington. Boston has more police per thousand, and Newark, N. J., has more police per thousand than Washington. We have more than San Francisco, New Orleans, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Chicago, New York, or any other city except the two mentioned.

Br. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Is the gentleman including in that number the Park Police, the Capitol Police, and the White House Police?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. No. Excluding all extra police, we still have more per thousand than any except the two cities I have mentioned—Boston and Newark.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact, taking the per capita, Washington is the second city in the number of murders and first in the number of robberies?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman is mistaken in that. According to the figures of the Department of Justice, in the number of murders in the cities of the United States Washington ranks twenty-seventh.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Per capita?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Per capita. Take the percentage in the nearest city to Washington—Richmond, Va. There the murders are 4.4 per capita; in Washington, 2.1, less than half of that in Richmond, Va.

Mr. BEITER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. Has the gentleman the number of deaths caused by traffic accidents in Washington compared with other cities?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We have the reports from Washington. Comparative statistics of accidents are not compiled by the Department.

Murders, robberies, burglaries, and every other form of crime with which the police deal are more efficiently controlled in Washington than in any of the major cities of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the city of Washington has more police and pays them better and has less crime than any other major city in the United States except Boston and New York.

Mr. BLANTON. And Richmond is a much smaller city than Washington.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman made a statement that we have more police per capita than in other cities. Does the gentleman take into consideration the fact that it is estimated that in Washington we have an average of about 150,000 to 200,000 people here right along as transients, which is not the case in the average American city?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Oh, there is no way of judging the number of transients, although I would say that New York and Chicago undoubtedly have more transients than Washington.

Mr. BOILEAU. Per capita?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I would think that that is true, although that is not the point at issue. The criterion which the Department of Justice judges the relative efficiency in control of crime is the rate per capita, and judged by that standard Washington compares favorably with any other city in the United States.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is it not a fact that the transient population is to be taken into consideration if we are to give protection, because these transients not only cause trouble but they require protection?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am certain we have less transients here than either New York or Chicago.

Mr. BOILEAU. I agree, but does the gentleman maintain that we have more transients in New York per capita than in the city of Washington, the center of the Nation's business? Is it not generally admitted that we have a much larger transient population in Washington by far than any other city in the Union?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It is not admitted, and there is no evidence to indicate it is true. If the gentleman has any statistics, I hope he will cite them.

Mr. BOILEAU. I have not the statistics, though I wish I had.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have those statistics.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We have not only better conditions in the city of Washington, more effective preservation of law and order, more police per capita, but we are constantly increasing our police force. It has been increased more than 300 in the last decade. In addition to that increase, both this year and last year—by the institution of traffic lights at the intersections—we have released a number of police formerly on duty as traffic officers at these intersections. Then we have placed radios in police cruising cars, thereby releasing one patrolman; a man for each car so equipped. Heretofore it required two men for each car, now with the radio it requires but one man to a car. As a result of that we were able in effect to add 40 men to the force this year. Where they had previously required two men to a cruising car, now with radio they require but one. We have released in the last 2 years by the installation of traffic lights approximately 25 men. That aggregates 65. We have made other readjustments which increased the efficiency of our police force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. How many policemen are there in the District of Columbia?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There are 1,304, not including park police and numerous other special units.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Pittsburgh is as large as or larger than this community, and has something like 800 policemen.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. And if you were to add 150 new policemen would it insure any change in the present conditions, in the gentleman's judgment?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. None whatever. We are amply policed.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I just wanted to support the gentleman's statement.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman not believe that Mr. Brown, head of the police department of Washington, knows more about the police situation than we Members of Congress?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. He ought to be informed, and he did not ask our committee for a single policeman. The statement has been made repeatedly this afternoon that he came before our committee and asked for additional policemen. The hearings will disclose that Superintendent Brown did not ask for additional police.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is a fact that the gentleman from Missouri has the highest regard for the Metropolitan Police force, is it not?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I so expressed myself in the hearings. We have a very efficient force and it is doing its duty. If we felt they needed a single additional man we would insist on his employment. After considering all the information that we could gather on the subject we reached the conclusion that the present force is ample.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Did anyone come before the committee and ask for additional policemen?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. No one.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think that if the authorities needed them they would have come around to see the gentleman rather than go to some outsider?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That would be a very natural conclusion.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is a fact that the board of trade, several citizens' associations, and the business men of this city, 800 strong, went on record publicly in favor of this addition to the police force of Washington, D. C. Is that not a fact?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. They sent a delegation which appeared before the committee on another matter, but they did not mention the police force.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, that is true.

Mr. BLANTON. They want all the money they can get, naturally.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I have been a member of the subcommittee of the District of Columbia on policemen and firemen, and I am now chairman of that subcommittee. I have never had a request for more policemen for the city of Washington.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is a rather significant statement, that the District Committee has not had any official intimation of any need for additional police.

Mr. Chairman, Washington is the best financed city in the United States. The cost per capita of government in Washington, D. C., is greater than that of any other American city, and while we have no statistics on other countries, I am inclined to think that the cost of government per capita is heavier in Washington than in any other city in the world, amounting to $78.75 per capita. Certainly there is no occasion for increasing this amount while we are struggling to balance the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has again expired.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

I recognize, Mr. Chairman, that it is very difficult to pass any amendment to any appropriation bill. There are 39 members of the committee, and they are nearly always present, and it is very difficult to get an amendment through.

All I have heard against the amendment is that there is no crime or comparatively no crime, or there is less crime in Washington than in other cities in the United States. There is one thing, however, that I want to call to the attention of the Membership here present, and that is the traffic conditions in Washington. The traffic conditions are such that additional patrolmen and additional traffic men are needed. One hundred and thirty-five people in the District of Columbia lost their lives last year on account of accidents, and hundreds, although I forget exactly how many, were wounded and injured in traffic accidents in the District of Columbia. The life of one American citizen, if it can be saved by the addition of patrolmen or traffic officers, is well worth the expenditure. This Congress should not stand in the way of doing that. If you drive through the streets of this city in the morning from 7:30 to 9:30 or in the afternoon from 4 o'clock until 6 o'clock, you will find the conditions which I have stated. I think the police force of Washington is a good force, efficient, capable, and alert. And they work hard, and they are doing their duty. The gentleman spoke of the Capitol Police, the White House Police, and the Park Police. They have nothing to do with this traffic situation, except in connection with traffic through the parks. But the Washington police are called out on more occasions, I will venture to say, than policemen are in many of the cities of the United States. Conditions are different in this city.

I am not a new Member. For 14 years I have seen this police force in the District of Columbia do its duty as well as, if not better than, any force in the United States. All I am asking the Membership to consider is that if you do not give a sufficient force to take care of traffic conditions in the District of Columbia we cannot expect to reduce the number of deaths and accidents in the District.

Incidentally, there are nearly half as many cars in this small space within the District of Columbia as there are in the entire State of North Carolina; in addition there are those that come from Virginia and Maryland and other States. My reason for addressing the Committee is for the protection of human life and property of our people in the District of Columbia and not with increasing the force or increasing the expense. The addition to the police force of 35 men will be an additional tax upon the District alone.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is a fact that conditions are not comparable to other cities because of our complex national life?

Mr. BULWINKLE. They cannot be compared.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There was no question, Mr. Chairman, that the committee investigated more thoroughly than the cause of traffic deaths on the streets of Washington. Every official of every department of the city government who could be expected to have any information on the subject or who could be expected to offer any explanation or who could be expected to suggest a remedy was carefully examined on this subject. We asked them: "What is the cause of this great increase in traffic deaths in the city, and what is the remedy?"

Mr. Chairman, not one who appeared before us said that the remedy was to increase the number of policemen. Not a man who appeared before us, as an examination of the hearings will disclose, said the increase was due to lack of police.

The gentleman from North Carolina has overlooked this one significant fact, that last year, with less policeman than we have now, we had only 80 traffic deaths. This year, with 40 or 50 more police released from other duties and available for service, the number of traffic deaths were 135, proving conclusively that there is no relation between the number of policemen and the number of traffic deaths.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then, under the logic of the gentleman, we could keep on decreasing the police force to the point where we had no deaths. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman says that 2 and 2 make 6, but 2 and 2 make 4. I repeat, that increasing the police force has not decreased the number of traffic deaths. This year, with an increase in the available police force, the number of deaths increased from 80 to 135.

Mr. Chairman, the information collated by the committee has demonstrated that there is no need for additional police force. Furthermore, not a single citizen appeared before the committee asking for more policemen. Not an official appeared before the committee asking for more policemen. Not a Congressman appeared before the committee asking for more policemen. The printed hearings show that no individual or organization appeared before us asking for additional policemen. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment should be voted down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The arguments we have heard would assume that we have not a police force here in Washington. If you were to bring all the 1,304 patrolmen to the Capitol and try to put them in the House Chamber, only one-third of them could be seated, because the seating capacity of the House is only 435. So it would take three shifts to get all of them into the House. That is how many patrolmen we have in Washington.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Just a minute. In addition to the Metropolitan Police of 1,304 patrolmen, we have 76 of the ablest policemen in the world on our Park Police force. No one can violate the law going through those parks. People who drive cars here obey the law better in the parks than anywhere else, because they know they are going to be arrested if they violate the law. The able, skillful park policemen are there.

In addition to that, we have a large force of special policemen in the White House grounds, every one of them having a Metropolitan badge and every one of whom can make an arrest.

Then around the Agricultural Department we have another special police force that has been there for years.

Out here at the Zoo Park we have another special police force policing the Zoo Park. No one can go through there and violate the law with impunity.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend from West Virginia and to my friend from North Carolina that if we could save one human life in Washington by putting on extra policemen, I would be willing to go the limit with them in putting on extra men.

I have been on this committee, studying this question, for years. I have introduced resolutions that caused more investigations of the police department here, both park and metropolitan, than any other man in Congress. I conducted the investigation of Captain McMorris, who was then at the head of the Park Police force, and caused his removal. I impeached a police commissioner, Col. Frederick A. Fenning, and through an investigation forced his resignation because of improper conduct.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman will admit that the rest of us had something to do with it.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the gentleman from North Carolina helped. [Laughter.] But I was the instigator of that; I impeached him; I led the attack; I conducted the hearings before the Judiciary Committee and the District Committee for weeks and even months.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I think the gentleman will admit that before he brought it up before the Committee on the Judiciary the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and I took it up before the Veterans' Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. That was after I produced the evidence against him. Oh, the gentleman from North Carolina performed valiant service. I take my hat off to him. He and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] helped me immensely, after I worked for months gathering the facts against Colonel Fenning.

But does he know more about this present police situation than our friend from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who has been studying this question for 23 years? Does he know more about it than the members of this subcommittee and the 39 members of the Committee on Appropriations? Do not these 39 men also have a concern about the protection of human lives? If they felt that the putting on of additional policemen would save human lives, they would have provided for it in this bill. They are just as much interested as is the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina; they are just as much concerned as is our splendid young colleague from West Virginia. But not a man appeared before our committee, from the superintendent of police down, and asked for even one additional policeman.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. All I heard from the gentlemen comprising the appropriations subcommittee was in reference to the matter of crime in the District. I told the gentleman I was not talking about crime; but when he was asked the question about the number of deaths and injuries caused by automobile accidents, I may say we received no facts in the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. The facts are fully stated in the hearings. May I say to the gentleman from North Carolina that if he will go to a prominent corner in New York City he will see that there is posted daily a bulletin heralding the daily increase to the number of traffic deaths. Every morning they add to the number of traffic deaths in the city of New York. We have traffic deaths everywhere.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Does the gentleman from Texas want me to go to New York to find out what I am attempting to find out from the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we have plenty of policemen here, I may say to the gentleman from North Carolina.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RANDOLPH) there were—ayes 40, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one combination hose wagon and one pumping engine, triple combination, all motor driven, $18,500.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer two amendments, which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent that the two amendments may be read and considered as one.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: On page 45, line 1, after the word "for", strike out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "three"; and on page 45, line 2, after the word "driven", strike out "$18,500" and insert "$34,500."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, the language at the top of page 45, as amended, will read:

For three combination hose wagons and one pumping engine, triple combination, all motor driven, $34,500.

I am very happy that the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] have given such complete emphasis to the fact in the previous discussion that nobody from the police department or nobody identified therewith or nobody who is interested in adding officers to the Metropolitan Police force came before the committee with the suggestion or proposal to increase the number. That, however, does not happen to be the case in connection with the fire department. There is nothing better I could do than to read from the hearings as to whether or not these additional pieces of equipment are necessary at this time. I read from the hearings of the committee.

Mr. CANNON. Now, we went out of our way and gave you everything in the world you asked for in the way of equipment last year, as I recall, except one piece of machinery. For this year, I notice you want three combination hose wagons.

Mr. SCHROM. Yes, sir.

Mr. Schrom, by the way, is the chief engineer of the fire department.

Mr. CANNON. Why would not the two we gave you last year be sufficient?

Mr. SCHROM. Mr. Chairman, we have right now 11——

Mr. CANNON. In the repair shop?

Mr. SCHROM. We have 11 that are really old and do not produce the proper efficiency.

Mr. CANNON. What is the difficulty? Are they antiquated?

Mr. SCHROM. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Or obsolete, or worn out—which of the two?

Mr. SCHROM. I would say they are worn out, and I will leave it to the superintendent of machinery to tell you, after I make this remark, that I think our older pieces are only making about 1 mile on a gallon of gasoline. Some of them are as much as 20 years old.

Think of it—there is fire apparatus in the District of Columbia almost 20 years old. Mr. CANNON continues:

Mr. CANNON. While they take more gasoline, do they attain a reasonable rate of speed?

Mr. SCHROM. Some of them do; some not. This estimate is designed to permit the purchase of three combination hose wagons at $8,000 each, and one pumping engine, $10,500.

Long experience has shown that this apparatus should not be kept in service longer than 15 years. To extend this period means to use apparatus that is obsolete in design, worn out and unreliable as to mechanical condition, and lacking power and performance. This is true not only of the pieces in active daily service, but also with regard to replacement pieces which are maintained to relieve apparatus in need of repair, and as active units in time of large fires, storms, and other emergencies.

Then follows a summary, and here is the summary: Number of hose wagons in the District as of 1936, 20 years old, 1. There are two 18 years old, six 17 years old, two 16 years old, and five that are 15 years old.

The number of pumping engines—there will be 7 that are 15 years old, 1 that is 17 years old, and 1 that is 18 years old.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know as it takes any elaboration on my part to show that this equipment is necessary if the District Fire Department is to be equipped with modern appliances, because after all the question of politics, patronage, and all that sort of thing never enters into the question of expeditious and efficacious putting out of fires and the saving of property of the people in the District.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] did not read the important part of the hearings. He did not read the questions I asked the chief as to whether or not they were sufficiently equipped to answer promptly all calls and as to whether there was any danger to either life or property with the present equipment, which would be lessened by the purchase of additional equipment. The chief testified they had ample equipment to meet all calls, that failure to add this additional equipment would in no way imperil life or property or add to the fire hazard in the District. The committee, after careful consideration, was convinced that the new equipment provided by the bill with the additions which the committee authorized last year were ample, and the committee therefore submits that this amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In the previous discussion the gentleman from Missouri stated they were always glad to have people come before the committee and submit their requests with respect to District problems in the hope of having the bill conform to the desires of the people.

Here we have the man who has the technical experience in putting out fires and in surveying and estimating the needs of the District so far as fire apparatus is concerned. He is an expert. He has been here a long time. He has been coping with metropolitan fire problems and he requests these additional pieces of equipment. I think, after all, that is the substance of the argument.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman is not familiar with the methods obtaining in making departmental estimates. We call before the committee the heads of departments and ask them what they want. They usually ask about twice what they expect to receive. It is not necessary to take more time on this small item. I will simply say, Mr. Chairman, that we have unquestionably a fire department with ample equipment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON of Missouri) there were—ayes 17, noes 37.

So the amendments were rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The disbursing officer of the District of Columbia is authorized to advance to the Director of Public Welfare, upon requisitions previously approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia and upon such security as may be required of said Director by the Commissioners, sums of money not to exceed $400 at any one time, to be used for expenses in placing and visiting children, traveling on official business of the board, and for office and sundry expenses, all such expenditures to be accounted for to the accounting officers of the District of Columbia within 1 month on itemized vouchers properly approved.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak under the broad heading of the general welfare of the District of Columbia, and I particularly direct my remarks to the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia on both sides of the aisle. I am not speaking, primarily, in my capacity as a Member of Congress but rather as a taxpayer in the District, as a home owner, and as the father of several children born in the city of Washington.

It seems to me that the committee and my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] could render a great service to the District and promote the general welfare of the District if they would give some consideration and take some favorable action to limit or wipe out and eradicate the soot nuisance that comes from the extensive and uncontrolled use of soft coal in the District of Columbia. I know nothing that is more injurious to the health of all the people who live in the District, whether young or old. This is one of the dirtiest places in America, filled with dirt and smoke and soot, and everyone who lives here knows this to be the fact. They know this by simply looking at the window sills of their rooms. They are covered every day with a heavy layer of soot. This soot and smoke is injurious to the eyes, nose, throat, and the lungs of both young and old.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman states that Washington is one of the dirtiest cities in the country. Has the gentleman ever been in Cincinnati or Pittsburgh?

Mr. FISH. I am pleased that the gentleman has asked this question. A few years ago I think Pittsburgh had the reputation of being about the dirtiest city in America. They have taken hold of this problem and they have applied drastic measures to eradicate the grime and soot nuisance in that city and with great success. I assume the gentleman represents a district that produces soft coal. I do not know whether the gentleman does or not, but I am simply inferring that from the question which he has asked.

Mr. HARLAN. We do not produce any coal.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman's State does.

Let me repeat, Pittsburgh has taken hold of this problem and has eliminated, so far as humanly possible, the soot and the dirt and the smoke from soft coal that is used in that city.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman ever been in Poughkeepsie?

Mr. FISH. As the gentleman has raised that question, that city, a very lovely and beautiful city, is situated in one of the finest congressional districts in the United States, in the highlands of the Hudson, only 3 miles from where the President of the United States has his home.

Mr. BLANTON. And where Vassar College thrives.

Mr. FISH. As a matter of fact, Poughkeepsie has not any smoke nuisance whatever, if the gentleman implies that.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say this to our friend from New York: If he will bring to the committee of which I am a member any plan we have authority to handle that will get rid of this nuisance in Washington, he will find a ready and sympathetic ear and action taken immediately.

Mr. FISH. That is all I am speaking about.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the gentleman's remedy? How are we going to stop it? We are not a legislative committee. We are an appropriating committee.

Mr. FISH. I will tell the gentleman how to stop it. In the first place, I understand a huge petition will be presented, signed by tens of thousands of the inhabitants of this District, requesting some action by your committee to eradicate the smoke and the soot and the dirt nuisance in order to protect the health of the people here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York has been here a long time and he knows that our committee is nothing in the world but an appropriating committee. It has no power over legislation at all. We cannot provide anything that is a change of law. Anything that changes present existing law has to come through the legislative committee, and the gentleman will admit that we are handicapped, and cannot place in our bill any legislative matter.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman heard what I said in the beginning. I said that I had hoped the members of the District of Columbia Committee were present while I was making these remarks, and naturally I inferred that the members of that committee would be here when your subcommittee on appropriations has the District bill under consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. But the Committee on Appropriations is powerless to remedy the situation to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. FISH. Absolutely powerless; but I will say this to the gentleman from Texas: As a member of this subcommittee and as a member of the Committee of the Whole House, he is not powerless on anything, and I am asking for his help in a very worthy cause.

Let me now go back to the situation existing here. I understand various civic organizations are going to submit a petition, signed by thousands of the taxpayers of the District, asking merely for relief and the abatement of the soot and smoke nuisance from the Congress, which is the governing body of the District. It is the function of every individual Member of Congress, but primarily of the District Committee, to help protect the health and promote the general welfare of the people living in the city of Washington.

Now, what can be done? There are several things. First, you can do what New York City does. You can prohibit the use of soft coal entirely. Its use is prohibited in New York City and, I presume, in other large cities in the country. This is the first and most drastic procedure. Next, you can put through various regulations to compel the use of certain screens to prevent soot and other kinds of cinders from going all over the city and into the lungs of the young children of Washington.

There is another consideration which I failed to mention. We have appropriated in recent years, and very properly so, millions upon millions of dollars to erect the most beautiful Government buildings in order to make Washington the greatest and most beautiful city in the world.

Many of these buildings have been erected, and many of them are already discolored because they have no protection from the soot and smoke resulting from the uncontrolled use of soft coal on an extensive scale.

I am making my plea hoping the District members here and others interested, when the matter is presented to you by petition of the people of Washington, will do what you can to eliminate this nuisance, in spite of the opposition coming from the soft-coal districts in the United States, and you will find plenty of opposition on both sides of the House. I believe you are interested in the welfare of the District, and I hope you will give it your immediate attention, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], with his ability and energy, will assist in getting favorable consideration of the petition asking for immediate relief from Congress.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman think also that the lungs of Members of Congress ought to be protected from soot? The smoke nuisance is a constant menace to their well-being and to that of their families.

Mr. FISH. I certainly do. Now, I cannot agree with the gentleman who spoke today asking that loudspeakers be installed in the House. It seems to me we have got along pretty well for 150 years without having any of these newfangled contrivances, loudspeakers and megaphones. If your constituents elect you and send you down here, they do not send you here to speak through megaphones or loudspeakers. I am opposed to putting a broadcasting system into the House of Representatives except when the President speaks. Each Member ought to have the ability and capacity to stand on the floor of the House and use his own voice and not be obliged to speak through a loudspeaker, megaphone, amplifier, or anything of that kind. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses: For general expenses in connection with the maintenance, care, improvement, furnishing of heat, light, and power of public parks, grounds, fountains, and reservations, propagating gardens and greenhouses under the jurisdiction of the National Park Service, including not to exceed $5,000 for the maintenance of the tourists' camp on its present site in East Potomac Park, and including personal services of seasonal or intermittent employees at per diem rates of pay approved by the Director, not exceeding current rates of pay for similar employment in the District of Columbia; the hire of draft animals with or without drivers at local rates approved by the Director; the purchase and maintenance of draft animals, harness, and wagons; contingent expenses; city directories; communication service; car fare; traveling expenses; professional, scientific, technical, and law books; periodicals and reference books, blank books and forms; photographs; dictionaries and maps; leather and rubber articles for the protection of employees and property; the maintenance, repair, exchange, and operation of not to exceed two motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and all necessary bicycles, motorcycles, and self-propelled machinery; the purchase, maintenance, and repair of equipment and fixtures, and so forth, $365,000: Provided, That not exceeding $20,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for placing and maintaining portions of the parks in condition for outdoor sports and for expenses incident to the conducting of band concerts in the parks; and not exceeding $10,000 for the erection of minor auxiliary structures.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

A Member of this House who passed from this life a few years ago, Will Wood of Indiana, appeared before our special committee investigating Government competition with private enterprise, and spoke in language both vigorous and profane. He said: "If you expect any truthful information from any of these blank bureaus or boards, you are a d—— fool."

The chairman of the subcommittee that considered this appropriation bill, Mr. CANNON of Missouri, had before him one of the so-called "bureau heads", and he asked him specifically concerning this item of $5,000 for the maintenance of the tourists' camp in Potomac Park. As I read the hearings before the subcommittee, I can see what the chairman was driving at. He wanted to save this item of $5,000. He persisted in his questioning, and the bureau head continued to find excuses for the item.

I ask the indulgence of the House at this time to place in the RECORD, for the enlightenment of future committees, just what was disclosed in the hearings before our special investigating committee, concerning this particular activity of the Welfare and Recreational Association, which is described as a private corporation incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia and operating under a franchise granted by the former Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks.

I offer copies of three letters, which were made a part of the records of our special committee, purporting to have passed between F. W. Hoover, general manager of the Welfare and Recreational Association, and a certain hotel in this city. The first is a letter from Mr. Hoover to the hotel stating that it had been approved as satisfactory for overflow from the tourist camp; the second is a letter from Mr. Hoover to the hotel dunning it for commissions on the business sent it from the tourist camp; and the third is a letter to Mr. Hoover from the hotel transmitting a check for $18.10 to cover the 20-percent commission.

This so-called "recreational organization" has a system by which, if your wife or children were to go to it for accommodations, or ask to be directed to an approved hotel in the city, they would be sent to a hotel on their list, and immediately thereafter this organization would set out to collect 20 percent of the money received by the hotel it recommended.

Mr. CANNON tried to ascertain why this $5,000 was needed. He was told that it was not needed, that the tourist camp was a going concern, and that they would not use the money, but they wanted it as a matter of safety. This is purely a business venture, where a public agency is levying on private industry. I do not believe there is a community in the United States that would tolerate such a practice.

I do not wish, at this moment, to raise a point against this particular item, for the reason I believe the gentlemen who considered the bill were honest in their belief that it should be included in the appropriations. But I do think the RECORD should contain these communications, a part of the official record of our special committee, and I ask unanimous consent that they be made a part of my remarks at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his remarks be extended in the manner indicated by including certain excerpts and letters. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANNON. It is hardly fair to the committee to ask that this item be struck from the bill at this time, especially in view of the fact that the chairman tried to get light on it from the Bureau; but I wish to make these remarks so that in the future the chairman will have this evidence, should he wish to use it in respect to another request for a similar appropriation.

The matter referred to follows:

Mr. Ringgold Hart, counsel, National Restaurant Association, Washington, D. C., testified December 7, 1932, before the committee:

"There came to my attention, and I transmitted to Mr. SHANNON, as chairman of the committee, three copies of letters that passed between the secretary of the Welfare and Recreational Association, Mr. Hoover, and a certain hotel. It involved the question of the tourist camp in Potomac Park. We thought the tourist camp was operated for people who came to visit the Capital and was not intended to be operated for profit. In the years 1930 and 1931 there was a tremendous profit made from the operation of that tourist camp. The statement which I submitted to Mr. SHANNON showed that the Welfare and Recreational Association profited to the extent of $25,845.95 in the year 1930 and $18,003.48 in 1931.

"Notwithstanding that profit, the secretary of the Welfare and Recreational Association demanded a 20-percent cut from tourists who could not procure accommodations at that tourist camp and were transferred to hotels. I respectfully submit that that was a wrong procedure. I submitted to you a copy of a letter from Mr. Hoover making that demand, a copy of the letter from the hotel in reply thereto, and a copy of the letter transmitting a check covering the 20 percent.

"Frank W. Hoover is secretary of the Welfare and Recreational Association, which is a private corporation incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia."

In accordance with the request which you recently made of me, an inspection has been made of the Gordon Hotel with a view to placing it on the approved list at the Washington tourist camp. The inspector has passed it as possessing satisfactory accommodations for overflow from the tourist camp.

The manager of the tourist camp has been advised to place the Gordon Hotel on the list of hostelries to which tourists are sent who cannot be accommodated at the camp. It is suggested that you furnish Mr. Clarke, manager of the camp, a supply of your special rate cards on which he can stamp the name of the camp.

You understand that this association requires in return for the inspection given your hotel and its listing at the camp payment of 20 percent of the gross revenues from the guests sent you. Payments should be made on or before the 5th of each month for the preceding month.

Very truly yours,

---

In order that the business of this association for the month of August may be closed at the earliest practicable date, please submit your check for commissions on business sent you from the tourist camp during the month of August as soon as convenient.

Very truly yours,

F. W. HOOVER, General Manager.

---

SEPTEMBER 6, 1932.

DR. F. W. HOOVER,
General Manager Welfare and Recreational
Association of Public Buildings and Grounds,
1052 New Navy Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HOOVER: Enclosed find check for $18.10 to comply with our agreement for commissions on the business sent to us for the month of August.

Thanking you for this business, I remain,

Yours very truly,

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 3973, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXCELLENT RECORD OF THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the Federal Trade Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, possibly what I have to say might have been more appropriately said when the independent offices appropriation bill was before the House for consideration a short time ago. Lacking the opportunity at that time, I now ask the indulgence of my colleagues for a few minutes in order to direct their attention to the work of an establishment of the Federal Government about which we may not hear a great deal either here on the floor of the House or in the public press. Nevertheless, it is my judgment, and I have taken the trouble to make some inquiries, that the establishment I have in mind is performing a most valuable service to the great consuming masses in this country.

Particularly is this true as to the smaller business and manufacturing interests, the "little fellow" who is engaged in business, and the small corporations and industrial concerns which are not able to maintain highly paid legal staffs, yet which are in much need of the service that this agency performs in protecting them from unfair trade practices and the sometimes greedy and selfish instincts and practices of the more powerful corporate interests, without which protection the small merchant and manufacturer might find it even more difficult to stay in business than he does find it now, rough as the going has been in recent years.

I am referring to the Federal Trade Commission. It is one of the smaller establishments of the Federal Government, with a small personnel, as Government departments and establishments go, and with relatively small appropriations, which I believe for the next fiscal year will be approximately $1,400,000.

KIEFER MAYER'S TRIBUTE

Recently, I received from a constituent of mine a highly commendatory letter about a phase of the work which the Federal Trade Commission is doing. The writer is Mr. A. K. Mayer, of Indianapolis, familiarly known in that city and throughout Indiana as Kiefer Mayer. Mr. Mayer is head of a large wholesale drug firm in my home city and is president of the National Wholesale Druggists' Association. Under the sponsorship of the Federal Trade Commission, there was recently held in Chicago a trade-practice conference for the wholesale drug industry of the country, with Commissioner Charles H. March presiding. At that conference there were about 500 wholesale druggists in attendance or represented by proxy, doing an annual business of more than $500,000,000, or probably 90 percent or more of the total volume of the wholesale drug business in the entire country. Of the success of that conference, Mr. Mayer wrote me in part as follows:

MY DEAR MR. LUDLOW:

Yesterday the wholesale drug industry had a trade-practice conference in Chicago, under the auspices of the Federal Trade Commission, with Hon. Charles H. March, Commissioner, presiding. There were over 500 in attendance, with approximately 95 percent of the members of the industry either present or represented by proxy.

In 1 hour and 35 minutes the different divisions of the wholesale drug industry approved rules of business conduct that, when approved by the Federal Trade Commission, will eliminate most of the unfair trade practices and trade abuses that have crept into the industry. These will turn wasteful methods into profits without any increase in prices to the consumer.

Before this formal conference, representatives of the industry spent about 7 hours with Judge McCorkle, director of trade-practice conferences of the Federal Trade Commission, so that altogether in less than 9 hours the industry wrote new rules under this Government agency and accomplished more than they had been able to do in 18 months before. These gentlemen in the Federal Trade Commission know their subject. They can give you a frank, clear, concise answer. If Congress would amend the Federal Trade Commission Act so that they could investigate and approve costs for an industry, it would solve the greater portion of the difficulties of American industry and would increase wages and employment in line with the wishes of the President.

Congress will no doubt consider amendments to or a revision of the N. I. R. A., and I just can't refrain from giving you my statements outlined above.

Trusting you are enjoying your usual good health and with very kind personal regards, I am,

Very respectfully,

A. K. MAYER.

VALUE OF TRADE-PRACTICE CONFERENCES

These trade-practice conferences have developed into an important and valuable phase of the work the Federal Trade Commission is doing. The plan for holding such conferences was developed in 1919, and their purpose is the elimination of unfair methods of competition or trade abuses. I am informed that approximately 150 such conferences have been held. They afford an opportunity for members of an industry to sit down together and under the auspices of the Federal Trade Commission consider methods for the correction or elimination of unfair and unethical business practices. It is a process in which an industry takes the initiative in establishing self-government, making its own rules of business conduct, subject, of course, to approval by the Commission, and necessarily within the limitations of law. Of course, the objective insofar as the Federal Trade Commission is concerned is to see that the interests of the public are protected. I am informed that it is the experience of the Federal Trade Commission with these conferences that they have resulted in a clearly marked trend toward higher standards of business conduct and that the agreements made by industries engaging in these conferences have been lived up to almost 100 percent.

SAVINGS OF HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS

There is another job the Federal Trade Commission is doing in which it is rendering a service to the American consumers that is saving them hundreds of millions of dollars. I refer to the investigation the Commission has been making of the electric and gas public utilities of the country. This investigation has been under way for more than 6 years and has been conducted under authority of a resolution introduced by the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana. This investigation has reached its final phase, and the Commission is now making its final report, which, I am informed, will include recommendations for legislation for the correction of evils that have grown up in the public-utility industries. About the time the Federal Trade Commission made public its annual report for the last fiscal year, the Washington Daily News in its issue of December 27, 1934, carried an editorial commenting on the value of the Federal Trade Commission to the American public, and especially the importance of the utility investigation. That editorial said in part:

Any one of a dozen achievements of the Federal Trade Commission last year may be cited as worth more in dollars to the American people than the cost of maintaining that useful Government agency. This is clear from its current annual report.

On a budget slightly in excess of a million dollars, the Commission last year carried on its customary policing of industry, between the various units and between industry and consumers.

In addition it did many other things. Its disclosure of malpractices and financial juggling in the electric and gas utility industries already has saved consumers millions of dollars. It may save them much more, if state regulatory bodies make proper use of this information.

Its study of monopolistic practices in the milk business can yield rich dividends in higher prices to dairy farmers and at the same time lower prices to milk consumers.

Its investigative services for N. R. A., A. A. A., and T. V. A. have measurably increased the efficiency of those Government agencies.

Its analysis of price-basing systems, steel-industry practices, gasoline-price trends, and corporate salaries are essential to Congress in framing important legislation.

Selfish interests, which want to be left free to exploit the people, try every year in Congress to cripple the Commission by curtailing its budget.

Few, if any, other branches of the Government give taxpayers as much for their money.

About the same time another great newspaper, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, printed an editorial entitled "A Great Public Service." Commenting on the utilities investigation, that editorial said in part:

The country is indebted for the investigation to the late Senator Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, whose resolution precipitated a battle which was in some respects a turning point in American history. Walsh asked for a special Senate committee to conduct the investigation, but after a long battle the utilities succeeded in substituting the Federal Trade Commission.

If the utilities thought the Commission would make a less exhaustive investigation than a Senate committee would have made, they were sadly mistaken. It became apparent at the outset that the Commission was not going to slight its task, and it never has done so. Its published reports are now a matter of public record. They tell the story of an exploitation which has no parallel outside the railroad industry in the United States. It is not an exaggeration to say that this investigation ended the dispute over Muscle Shoals; that it was the inspiration of the Tennessee Valley project; that it crystallized the Government's new policy with respect to such social services as electricity, gas, water, and communication.

SAVINGS ARE CUMULATIVE

It is not possible to estimate closely the amount of savings which the American consuming public has enjoyed from electric and gas rates reductions that have resulted directly or indirectly from disclosures made during the Commission's investigation. Nearly a year ago, an estimate was made based on rate reductions noted during the years 1930 to 1933, inclusive, by a prominent trade journal in the electrical field. During that 4-year period, the publication in question noted 139 reductions with a total estimated consumer saving amounting to nearly $120,000,000. Fifty-eight additional reductions were noted, but without the amount of the reductions being given. They were, therefore, not included in any estimate of consumer savings. If these savings were known and there could be added to them savings due to rate reductions which escaped the attention of the technical papers, they would probably add many millions of dollars annually to the amount of consumer savings. These savings are, of course, cumulative because they continue in force from year to year, and some of them will in all probability be increased by further reductions, so that the total in a few years will unquestionably exceed a billion dollars. The figures I have mentioned do not include any gas-rate reductions at all, relating only to electric rates.

Up to the present the Commission has filed with the Senate 73 volumes of reports covering the record made up during the investigation, of which 65 volumes have been printed as Senate documents, the other 8 now being in the hands of the Printer. In addition, it has filed its final report on the propaganda activities of the utilities and has sent to the Senate two installments of its final report on the corporate organization, control, and financial practices of holding companies and their subsidiaries in the electric and gas field. The inquiry has covered corporations with assets of more than $10,000,000,000 and has included the investigation by members of the Commission's staff of 18 superholding companies, 42 subholding companies, and 91 operating companies, as well as many other affiliated companies.

At last reports, the total cost to the Federal Treasury of the power and gas utility investigation over the period of more than 6 years since the inquiry was launched was not quite $2,000,000. Certainly, the consuming public has already been paid handsome dividends for the investment made in this investigation, not to mention the public benefit which will follow whatever regulatory policy may be adopted by the Congress in its wisdom, based upon the information gathered during the inquiry.

In my remarks, I have called attention to only two phases of the work the Federal Trade Commission is doing. Of course, there are many others, but I think I have said enough to do what I had in mind, that is, bring to your attention the value of this establishment which in many particulars is the only Government agency that gives protection to the consuming masses and the smaller businesses and industries of the country.

FORMER MEMBERS OF CONGRESS GIVE HIGH ORDER OF SERVICE

I should like to say in conclusion that the work of this Commission is probably of special interest to many of you because of the presence on it of two of our former colleagues. I refer to the Honorable Ewin L. Davis, of Tennessee, who is now serving as chairman, and the Honorable William A. Ayres, of Kansas, who last summer resigned his seat in this House to accept a position on the Commission by appointment of President Roosevelt. Other members of the Commission are Hon.

Garland S. Ferguson, Jr., of North Carolina, and Hon. Charles H. March, of Minnesota. The fifth place on the Commission is now vacant, but it is expected that it will be filled soon by appointment by the President. Commissioner Davis, the chairman, was for 14 years a Member of this House and served as Chairman of the important Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries. Mr. Ayres is a veteran of 20 years in this House and for several years was my associate on the Appropriations Committee and was chairman of the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee. Most of you know these gentlemen personally and know the high order of service of which they are capable and the broad experience which they have brought to their duties in the responsible positions they now occupy. It is my information and my judgment that that important Commission has never engaged upon more important work than is now receiving its attention and never performed its duties with more ability and dispatch than now.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Monday, January 21, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

MONDAY, JANUARY 21, 1935

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who by the miracle of light hast brought again the earth out of nightly shadows into new hours of beauty and delight, grant that this day, wherein a wondrous duty lies, may see fulfilled the hope and expectation of our country, for with Thy inner voice to guide us we shall find Thy praise sufficient crown.

Search us, O God, and know our hearts; try us and know our thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in us; and lead us in the way everlasting, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Friday, January 18, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 3973) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia, and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

RECOMMENDATIONS FOR AMENDMENTS TO COMMUNICATIONS ACT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, transmitting, on behalf of the Commission, pursuant to section 4 (k) of the Communications Act of 1934, recommendations for three proposed amendments to the Communications Act, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

OCTOBER REPORT OF FEDERAL EMERGENCY RELIEF ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of the Administrator covering the period of October 1 to October 31, 1934, inclusive, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, memorializing Congress to promptly enact legislation to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. NORRIS.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Nebraska, memorializing Congress to provide effective Federal assistance to aid in controlling and eradicating field bindweed, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. NORRIS.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from James E. Hughes, of Cambridge, Md., praying for the enactment of old-age pension legislation, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the council of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of members of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Lafontaine, Kans., praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of Beloit Post, No. 57, the American Legion, of Beloit, Kans., favoring the enactment of the four-point program of the American Legion and the immediate payment of adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Peabody, Kans., and members of Henry F. Hall Post, No. 183, American Legion, of Drexel, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation providing immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WAGNER presented the following senate resolution of the Legislature of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, January 15, 1935.

Senate Resolution 22 (by Mr. Hendel)

Whereas the outrageous conduct of certain officials of the Mexican Government in carrying on a studied campaign against freedom of religion, the press, the right of assembly, and the freedom of education has shocked the sensibilities of fair-minded people throughout the State of New York; and

Whereas this persecution, because of the religious belief of large numbers of the residents and citizens of Mexico is entirely alien to concepts of liberty and freedom of thought in the Western Hemisphere, as distinguished from racial and religious hatreds and enmities existing in the Old World; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the State of New York that the Government of the United States, acting through the proper officials, take appropriate action in condemning the tactics of such officials of the Mexican Government: And, be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and to each United States Senator and Member of Congress elected from the State of New York.

By order of the senate:

JAMES J. REILLY, Clerk.

Mr. WAGNER. I also present a resolution adopted by the Farmers' and Hotelkeepers' Association, of Ellenville, N. Y., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELLENVILLE FARMERS' AND HOTELKEEPERS' ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Ellenville, N. Y., January 17, 1935.

Hon. Senator WAGNER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: The following is a copy of a resolution adopted at a meeting of our association held on January 10, 1935:

"Resolution

"Whereas the savings banks have greatly reduced the interest rate on deposits; and

"Whereas the farmers, home owners, and business men cannot afford to pay 6 percent on mortgages and loans on account of the reductions in their incomes: Be it

"Resolved, That we request our representatives in the legislature and Congress to introduce legislation to reduce the legal interest rate on all loans and mortgages to 5 percent or less."

We will appreciate it if you will do everything possible to bring about such reduction in the interest rate.

Respectfully yours,

E. YAFFE, Secretary.

Mr. NORRIS presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES TO ENACT FEDERAL LEGISLATION TO CONTROL AND ERADICATE FIELD BINDWEED

(Introduced by Senators Brady, Gillette, Cady, Green, and Warner)

Whereas the forty-ninth session of the Nebraska State Legislature passed and approved a bill to provide for the control and eradication of field bindweed (Convolvulus arvensis), in which was prescribed the duties of certain county and State officers with respect thereto in article 14, Code Annotated Supplement, 1933 (ch. 2, Session Laws of Nebraska, 1933); and

Whereas the eradication of the field bindweed, which has become common on Nebraska farms, is a question which requires Federal assistance and cooperation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate in fiftieth session assembled—

1. That this senate respectfully petitions and memorializes the Congress of the United States forthwith to provide effective assistance by the Federal Government to control and eradicate field bindweed.

2. That the secretary of this senate be directed forthwith to forward copies of this resolution, properly authenticated and suitably engrossed, to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and to the several Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Nebraska in the National Congress, as well as to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, to the end that necessary remedial and beneficial laws with respect to the control of field bindweed be enacted for the benefit of agriculture in Nebraska and neighboring States.

Mr. NORRIS also presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Nebraska, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolution introduced by Senators Mattson, Gillette, Brady, Van Kirk, and Howard

Whereas there is pending in our National Congress bills providing for immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates held by the veterans of the World War; and

Whereas an emergency exists in our country and payment of these certificates would act as a relief and recovery measure; and

Whereas there has been stated upon good authority that the amount due can be paid with sound currency and that such payment will not increase national taxes or create additional debt. That such payment would be a godsend to this country because it will quickly distribute purchasing power immediately and uniformly into every nook and corner of this Nation into the deserving hands of those who need it, and that payment now is in the interest of the nonveterans as well as the veterans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Nebraska in regular session assembled, That it is the opinion of this body that Congress should enact legislation permitting immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates held by the World War veterans; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon our records and a copy sent to each Senator and Congressman of the State of Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS also presented the following resolutions of the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

A RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO ELIMINATE THE TAXATION OF GASOLINE BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has imposed a tax upon all sales of gasoline; and

Whereas the imposition of this Federal tax has caused the users of motor vehicle fuel in the State of Nebraska to pay in excess of $2,000,000 annually as Federal taxes on the said product; and

Whereas the State of Nebraska now imposes a tax of 4 cents a gallon on all gasoline imported into the State and all other States of the United States have already imposed similar taxes upon such sales; and

Whereas the Federal tax on such sales is untimely and prohibitive and, coupled with the respective State taxes on such sales, places a burden upon the users of gasoline in Nebraska beyond which they should carry and beyond that which the traffic can legitimately bear; and

Whereas the taxation of sales of gasoline should properly be left to the exclusive use of the States as a means of providing funds for road construction and maintenance: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully memorialized to enact with all convenient speed such legislation as may be necessary to abolish the Federal gasoline sales tax and to surrender to the States exclusively the power to tax such sales in the future; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and to each Member of Congress elected in the State of Nebraska, and that our Congressmen be urged to use their best offices to procure the enactment of such legislation as will accomplish the purposes of this resolution.

---

RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES FAVORING THE SPEEDY PASSAGE OF A BILL PROVIDING FOR FEDERAL OLD-AGE PENSION

Whereas the Seventy-fourth Session of the Congress of the United States now has before it for consideration numerous bills touching every phase of the old-age-pension problem as viewed from the national standpoint; and

Whereas it is the sense of this house that, in the interest of all groups and sections of this country, the matter of old-age pensions should be treated as a national and not as a State problem for remedial legislation, peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Congress and not subject to the whims and caprices of the legislatures of several States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Nebraska in fifteenth session assembled—

1. That it is the conclusion of this house, based on its thorough survey of all plans proposed for the sympathetic and intelligent treatment of aged persons, that some rational and uniform legislation on the part of Congress which will require, among other things, contributions to in part by the beneficiaries of said pension while they are still engaged in productive and profitable pursuits as well as contributions from the national bounty, be immediately considered by the Seventy-fourth Congress, not as a measure of temporary relief but from the standpoint of a permanent economic policy of the National Government.

2. That the clerk of this house is hereby ordered and directed forthwith to forward a copy of this resolution, properly authenticated, to the Vice President of the United States, to the United States Senators represening the State of Nebraska, and to the Congressmen representing the State of Nebraska in the National Congress, to the end that they and each of them may urge and vote for the immediate adoption of Federal legislation in accordance with the tenor of this resolution.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of New York, favoring the taking of appropriate action by the United States in protest against alleged activities of certain officials of the Mexican Government in carrying on a campaign against freedom of religion, the press, the right of assembly, and the freedom of education, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. WAGNER.)

Mr. COPELAND also presented resolutions adopted at a recent convention of the American Federation of Labor at San Francisco, Calif., favoring the enactment of the so-called "King-Dies bill", relative to the entry of undesirable aliens into the country in the disguise of seamen, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

PETITION RELATIVE TO RADIO HEARINGS BEFORE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. BONE. I send to the desk a voluminous petition containing some 54,000 signatures, I am sure, which I have received from the State of Washington, asking that there be printed at Government expense the radio hearings recently held before the Federal Communications Commission relative to the allocation of radio facilities. I have been requested by the petitioners to send this record to them, but I have been assured that it contains many thousand pages of typewritten matter. Since it would involve either copying that in my office or having it printed and mailing it there, my office facilities are wholly inadequate for such a task, and I take this method of acknowledging receipt of the petition. I believe, Mr. President, one of my colleagues has requested that there be printed in the RECORD a copy of this petition. I believe that it is a petition that has been generally employed throughout the United States. So I will not ask that it be reprinted in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator is not asking for action upon the matter now, is he?

Mr. BONE. No; I am merely filing the petition which contains, I think, some fifty-three or fifty-four thousand names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, underlying the arguments now being made for adherence to the World Court and League of Nations is the growing insistence of public opinion on the supremacy of law over lawlessness. Such advocacy will be strengthened by evidence that our own national house is being set in order. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and I are sponsoring before this body and Representative FORD of California in the House of Representatives a measure having these ends in view.

We have offered an antilynching bill, S. 24, substantially in the form in which an earlier measure was favorably reported to the Senate by the Judiciary Committee at the last session of Congress. For convenient reference I ask that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks; that it be followed by an article from a publication entitled "The Crisis" for January 1935, and that the article be referred to the Judiciary Committee. This well-considered article by the well-known author and authority, Walter White, is both concise and informative with respect to reasons for and Nation-wide endorsements of the proposed legislation—South, North, West, and East—and concludes with a useful summary of the bill.

There being no objection, the article was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the bill and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws by discouraging, preventing, and punishing the crime of lynching

Be it enacted, etc., That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage", when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert, without authority of law, for the purpose of killing or injuring any person in the custody of any peace officer or suspected of, charged with, convicted of the commission of any crime, with the purpose or consequence of preventing the apprehension and/or trial and/or punishment by law of such person or otherwise of depriving such person of due process of law or the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. If any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life or person of any individual within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, whether by way of preventing or punishing the acts thereof, such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person due process of law and the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that the protection guaranteed to persons within the jurisdictions of the several States, or to citizens of the United States, by the Constitution of the United States, may be secured, the provisions of this act are enacted.

SEC. 3. (a) Any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision thereof who is charged with the duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer or employee to protect the life or person of any individual injured or put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage or any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision thereof having any such individual in his custody, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all diligent efforts to protect such individual from being so injured or being put to death or any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision thereof charged with the duty of apprehending, keeping in custody, or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all diligent efforts to perform his duty in apprehending, keeping in custody, or prosecuting to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons so participating, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

(b) Any officer or employee of any State or governmental subdivision thereof, acting as such officer or employee under authority of State law, having in his custody or control a prisoner, who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person who is a member of a mob or riotous assemblage to injure or put such prisoner to death without authority of law, or who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to suffer such prisoner to be taken or obtained from his custody or control to be injured or put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall be guilty of a felony, and those who so conspire, combine, or confederate with such officer or employee shall likewise be guilty of a felony. On conviction the parties participating therein shall be punished by imprisonment of not less than 5 years nor more than 25 years.

SEC. 4. The District Court of the United States judicial district wherein the person is injured or put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall have jurisdiction to try and to punish, in accordance with the laws of the State where the injury is inflicted or the homicide is committed, any and all persons who participate therein: Provided, That it is first made to appear to such court (1) that the officers of the State charged with the duty of apprehending, prosecuting, and punishing such offenders under the laws of the State shall have failed, neglected, or refused to apprehend, prosecute, or punish such offenders; or (2) that the jurors obtainable for service in the State court having jurisdiction of the offense are so strongly opposed to such punishment that there is probability that those guilty of the offense will not be punished in such State court. A failure for more than 30 days after the commission of such an offense to apprehend or to indict the persons guilty thereof, or a failure diligently to prosecute such persons, shall be sufficient to constitute prima facie evidence of the failure, neglect, or refusal described in the above proviso.

SEC. 5. Any county in which a person is seriously injured or put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall be liable to the injured person or the legal representatives of such persons, or the estate of such deceased person for a sum of not less than $2,000 nor more than $10,000 as liquidated damages, which sum may be recovered in a civil action against such county in the United States District Court of the judicial district wherein such person is put to the injury or death. Such action shall be brought and prosecuted by the United States district attorney of the district in the United States District Court for such district. If such amount awarded be not paid upon recovery of a judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may otherwise compel payment thereof by mandamus or other appropriate process; and any officer of such county or other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor. The amount recovered shall be exempt from all claims by creditors of such injured or deceased person, or the legal representative of such injured person or of the estate of such deceased person. The amount recovered upon such judgment shall be paid to the injured person, or where death resulted, distributed in accordance with the laws governing the distribution of an intestate decedent's assets then in effect in the State wherein such death occurred.

SEC. 6. In the event that any person so injured or put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another county or counties during the time intervening between his seizure and injury or putting to death, the county in which he is seized and the county in which he is injured or put to death shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided, and action shall be brought and prosecuted by the United States district attorney of any district wherein any such county is located. Any district judge of the United States district court of the judicial district wherein any suit or prosecution is instituted under the provisions of this act may by order direct that such suit or prosecution be tried in any place in such district as he may designate in such order.

SEC. 7. If any provision, sentence, or clause of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the remainder of this act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

[From the Crisis, January 1935]

THE COSTIGAN-WAGNER BILL

By Walter White

Promptly upon the convening of Congress on January 3, Senators EDWARD P. COSTIGAN, of Colorado, and ROBERT F. WAGNER, of New York, will reintroduce in the Senate their bill to make lynching a Federal offense. The bill will be reintroduced in the House by Congressman THOMAS F. FORD, of Los Angeles.

Developments since Congress adjourned without voting on the bill in June 1934 have given whatever proof was needed that there can be no end to lynching unless there is Federal legislation. The perverted and fiendish mutilation of Claude Neal at Marianna, Fla., late in October revealed as few other lynchings in the history of the United States have that there are States in America where it is useless to expect any effective action against lynching by local authorities. At the date of writing, the lynching record for 1934 lends striking affirmation to the contentions of the supporters of the Costigan-Wagner bill. Of 17 lynchings, 2 occurred early in January. Then there was a complete cessation of lynching until it was evident in June that Congress would adjourn without voting on the bill. Fifteen lynchings, among them the one widely advertised in advance at Marianna, occurred between June and the end of November.

ENDORSED BY 42,000,000

There have been within recent months significant changes in the general attitude toward Federal legislation against lynching. In October the triennial convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, at its meeting in Atlantic City, N. J., voted by an overwhelming majority to support Federal action. It is exceedingly significant that the movement for this resolution was led by bishops and laymen from Southern States, including Mississippi, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Alabama. In October the American Federation of Labor, at its San Francisco convention, for the first time voted active endorsement and support of the Costigan-Wagner bill. Organizations with a total membership of more than 42,000,000 have now endorsed the bill, as follows:

The Young Women's Christian Association; Young Men's Christian Association; Writers' League Against Lynching; City-Wide Forum of Baltimore, Md.; Maryland Anti-Lynching Federation; Congregational Commission on Lynching; Committee on Race Relations of the Society of Friends; the Federal Council of Churches; the League for Industrial Democracy; the Church League for Industrial Democracy; the Fellowship of Reconciliation; the Josephite Order of Baltimore, Md.; American Civil Liberties Union; National Urban League; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; the Methodist Federation of Social Service; the Interdenominational Preachers' Meeting of New York and Vicinity; Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; Women's Missionary Council of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; Board of National Missions of the Presbyterian Church, United States of America; Social Justice Commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis; National Student Council of the Young Women's Christian Association; public affairs committee of the Young Women's Christian Association; American Federation of Teachers; Winter Capital Lodge of Elks, New Orleans, La. (Winter Capital Lodge, No. 595, Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World, signers of petition); Oakland (Calif.) Council of Church Women; Colored Methodist Episcopal Church; Twenty-second District Republican Club of New York; Hartford (Conn.) Federation of Churches; City Council of Cleveland, Ohio; Holy Name Society of Our Lady Queen of the Angels Church, Newark, N. J.; Nashville (Tenn.) Pastors Association; New York State Assembly; Indiana State Assembly; City Council of Duluth, Minn.; Toledo (Ohio) Council of Churches; Unity Circle of the First Unitarian Church, Des Moines, Iowa; Chicago Committee on Anti-Lynching Legislation; Protestant Episcopal Church; New Jersey State Legislature; International Youth Movement; El Paso (Tex.) Woman's City Government Club; Congregational and Christian Churches; New York City Congregational Church Association; Chautauqua Circle, Atlanta, Ga.; National Association of Colored Women; National Baptist Convention; American Federation of Labor, at San Francisco convention.

OPPONENTS HAVE SHIFTED

Opponents of the bill also have shifted somewhat in their opposition. There are those who honestly question the constitutionality of a Federal law against lynching. Most of this opposition is based upon the contention that punishment for lynching is exclusively the function of the State, in that lynching is murder and nothing more. But, as James Weldon Johnson rightly pointed out in an article in Current History in 1930, lynching is murder and more than murder, in that the mob sets itself up as judge, jury, and executioner and flouts all orderly processes of law. Under the new concept of the Federal Constitution as being a living document rather than a dead and unchangeable instrument, more and more recognition is being given to the fact that the Federal Government has equal responsibility with the State in assuring to citizens equal protection of the laws, and that the Federal Government not only has the right but the obligation to supply that margin of protection which the individual States either cannot or will not supply.

WHAT THE BILL PROVIDES

In order that there may be as wide-spread understanding of the provisions of the Costigan-Wagner bill as possible, we give here a summary of the principal features of the measure:

For the purposes of this act the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage" * * * shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert, without authority of law, to kill or injure any person, with the purpose or consequence of depriving such person of due process of law or the equal protection of the laws.

Section 2: Failure, neglect, or refusal to protect an individual against a mob is deemed denial of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws of the State.

Section 3: (a) Failure on the part of any local or State officer charged with the duty to protect an individual in his custody from injury or death, or to apprehend, keep in custody, or prosecute any mob member, is held to be a felony, punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

(b) Any local or State officer who conspires with a member of a mob to injure or put a prisoner to death without authority of law, or who suffers such prisoner to be taken from his custody to be injured or put to death, shall be guilty of a felony, and those who so conspire with such officer shall likewise be guilty of a felony. On conviction the parties participating therein shall be punished by imprisonment of not less than 5 years or more than 25 years.

Section 4: Gives jurisdiction to the District Court of the United States judicial district wherein the person is injured or killed by a mob to try and punish in accordance with the laws of the State all persons who participate therein: Provided, State officers have failed to apprehend, prosecute, or punish such offenders; or (2) that jurors are so opposed to such punishment that there is probability that those guilty will not be punished in such State court. Failure to act within 30 days after the offense, to apprehend, indict, or prosecute shall constitute prima facie evidence of the failure, neglect, or refusal described.

Section 5: County liability. Injured persons or legal representatives may recover from $2,000 to $10,000 from the county involved in civil action against such county in the United States district court in whose jurisdiction the person is injured or killed. Prosecution by the United States district attorney. Where the county fails to pay the judgment, the court has jurisdiction to enforce payment by levy of execution upon property of the county or may otherwise compel payment by mandamus or other appropriate process. Failure of any officer to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor. The amount recovered is exempt from claims of creditors and shall be paid to the injured person or his heirs.

Section 6: Where the victim has been transported from one county to another county, both counties shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture. Any district judge of the United States district court concerned may direct that the prosecution be tried in whatever place he designates in such district.

Section 7: If any provision, sentence, or clause of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid the remainder of this act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

EXCLUSION OF ALIENS FROM APPORTIONMENT COUNT

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 40) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States to exclude aliens in counting the whole number of persons in each State for apportionment of Representatives among the several States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution which I have just introduced provides simply that—

> Aliens shall be excluded from the count of the whole number of persons in each State in apportioning representatives among the several States according to their respective numbers.

Under the present wording of the Constitution, those States with large numbers of unnaturalized aliens—there are some 6,000,000 of these in the United States—are given credit for these unnaturalized aliens in the apportionment of congressional Representatives and Presidential electors. Those States which are most largely composed of native-born and naturalized citizens are deprived of representation they should be entitled to.

The justice of this amendment I am proposing is attested by the fact that in those States which are given extra congressional and electoral representation because of their large number of unnaturalized aliens—in those States these un-naturalized aliens are excluded from the count in apportioning representation in their State legislatures and assemblies.

In the latest apportionment, the agricultural and interior industrial States in which the population is predominantly American, lost half a dozen Congressmen to those States in which there are several million of unnaturalized aliens. This condition should be corrected before the next census is taken, and can be corrected by submitting my amendment to the States. There is no question that it would be ratified when submitted.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 3973) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. HAYDEN, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 809) for the relief of Julius McKindry Henderson, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

MARY A. CHAPLINE

Mr. BARKLEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 57), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1935, to Mary A. Chapline, widow of Charles B. Chapline, late an employee of the Senate folding room under the supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, the sum of $250, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SURVEY OF LAND AND WATER POLICIES AND PROJECTS

Mr. O'MAHONEY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 58), which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, three of whom shall be members of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and three of whom shall be members of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, is authorized and directed to make a survey and study of all land and water policies and projects of the several executive agencies and establishments of the Government and to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its survey, together with its recommendation for necessary legislation in connection therewith.

The committee or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized to attend the National Grazing Conference to be held under the auspices of the Department of the Interior at Denver, Colo., February 11, 1935.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, including expenditures for travel, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $5,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

THE BANKHEAD ACT AND DEMOCRACY

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I present an article by Clarence Poe, president and editor of the Progressive Farmer, entitled "The Bankhead Act and Democracy", together with an illustration. I request that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it subsequently printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THP WORLD COURT—STATEMENT BY GEN. JOHN F. O'RYAN

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement in favor of the World Court by Gen. John F. O'Ryan, commander of the Twenty-seventh Division of the American forces in France during the World War.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOHN F. O'RYAN, COMMANDER OF THE TWENTY-SEVENTH DIVISION OF THE AMERICAN FORCES IN FRANCE DURING THE WORLD WAR, URGES AMERICAN MEMBERSHIP IN THE WORLD COURT—WAR IS THE DESTROYER OF THE VIRILE, PROTECTOR OF THE UNFIT

The question of our adherence to the World Court is now before the Senate for decision. Years have elapsed since this question was first discussed by the people of the country. The intervening time has afforded opportunity for extreme partisans on both sides to "cool off" and for the mass of us to consider the question unemotionally and upon its merits. It is not an exaggeration to say that the determination to be made is a momentous one.

Will our adherence to the World Court give greater stability to world peace and, therefore, to peace for the people of this country? Or will our adherence complicate the peace structure and lessen for us the probability of avoiding war? Finally, can the World Court function in the interest of peace as effectively without our adherence as with it?

I have attempted, both as a lawyer and as one who witnessed first-hand some of the tragedies and waste of the World War, to answer these questions to my own satisfaction. I believe it to be in the interest of world peace and in the interest of the people of the United States that, without delay, the Senate should ratify our adherence to the Court. The following are some of the reasons for this conclusion:

(1) The families of the world cannot seriously expect their governments to maintain world law and order unless the world is organized for the maintenance of world law and order. At present, and in the past, governments have been organized for war. All authorities on this question of world peace are agreed in principle that world peace cannot be maintained without world organization for its maintenance.

(2) I cannot conceive this world as it will be 100 years from now without world organization for the maintenance of world law and order, which includes the suppression of war as distinguished from the internationally lawful use of world police power. If this is true, it is in our interest to advance the date of the advent of this condition.

(3) Nowhere, perhaps, other than in the history of our own country can there be found a better precedent for what is proposed. The Thirteen Original States were at the conclusion of the Revolutionary War sovereignties as free and independent each of the other as are the present peoples and governments of Europe. Although their population differed widely in background, in creed, in habits, in outlook, and in regard to the question of slavery, they, nevertheless, for their own good and in the interest of peace, surrendered some measure of their sovereign rights. They agreed to vest in the central authority such control of the military man power of the population of the States (in other words, the militia) for the purpose of suppressing insurrection, repelling invasion, and executing the laws; and these sovereign States also agreed that none of them would maintain an army without the consent of Congress. They also agreed to the establishment of a Supreme Court independent of all the States, the decrees of which would be final in relation to interstate matters. This happy condition was not arrived at without bitter debate. Practically all of the objections made in this country in relation to the existing League of Nations and the World Court were registered at the time of the Constitutional Convention against the adoption of the American covenant which we call the Constitution and which vested these powers in the Federal Government. It was only by a small majority of the votes of the delegates that the Federal Constitution was adopted.

In this connection a vital feature of the plan was that every last State should give its adherence. If Pennsylvania or New York, for example, had remained aloof, that circumstance would have changed in unhappy fashion our entire history. The absence of any one State from adherence to our Constitution would have vitally weakened the whole structure. So it is with the existing world organization for peace. Its greatest weakness is not only the absence of one civilized country—our own—but the fact that from the military viewpoint that country is the most powerful Nation in the world, possessing as it does a great man power having martial qualities, vast wealth, unprecedented industrial capacity for munitions manufacture, and a history of conquest.

(4) It may be said that this covenant of the American Constitution failed to prevent the Civil War. That is true. And it is also true that for similar reasons the existing world organization for peace has not wholly prevented war since its establishment. Nevertheless, as our Constitution and the Government under it grew in strength and developed a supporting force of judicial determinations, so the present world organization for peace will grow in strength and dependability. Most of all, it must have the support and membership of the powerful United States, which at the present time, from the world viewpoint, is free to make war when, where, and upon whom it pleases—the various pious pacts to the contrary notwithstanding.

Finally, those who undertake to consider this subject unemotionally and impartially must dismiss from their minds inherited prejudices and hatreds, if they exist, in relation to present and past affairs of European history. They must realize that war has been a greater plague to the human race than any of the dreadful scourges, epidemics, and plagues that have from time to time swept the populations of the world. These plagues and epidemics tended to kill off the weak and defective rather than the strong and virile. Thus, in general terms, it might be said that they acted as a purge. War, however, works the other way. The entire system of war tends to shelter from its scourge the physically weak, the mentally defective, the neurotics, the diseased, and the habitual drunkards. It sends into the fire of battle for potential destruction the young men of all the lands who are the fittest in all respects. War is actually the most effective form of race suicide known to man. It is in the light of this knowledge that our people should view the effect of our adherence to the World Court upon the question of substituting reason for wholesale homicide in the settlement of international disputes which are justiciable.

THE WORLD COURT—EDITORIAL FROM WASHINGTON HERALD AND STATEMENT BY WILL ROGERS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from last Saturday's Washington Herald on the subject of the World Court, and also an interview with Will Rogers in the Washington Times of last Saturday. I wish to say that Will Rogers is not only the most famous son of my State but one of the greatest humorists in this country, and, in addition to that, he is one of its greatest philosophers.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, Jan. 19, 1935]

AMERICA FIRST

According to the United States Treasury Department, whose official figures were published recently, the World War cost the United States 50 thousand million dollars.

And this does not include the 12 thousand million dollars of war debts owed the United States by foreign nations.

The total, therefore, of actual cost to the United States through our own folly and foreign perfidy is 62 thousand million dollars.

Instead of a national debt of over 30 thousand million dollars the United States would have today a surplus of over 30 thousand million dollars, if President Wilson had only "kept us out of the war" as he was elected to do.

Instead of the present system of cruel taxation, which breaks the back of industry, robs labor of employment, and deprives the community of purchasing power, Federal taxation today would be at a minimum and our National Government would have surpluses to distribute to the States, as was contemplated and planned in 1912.

Instead of wringing blood money from a people harassed by business and employment difficulties, our Government would have today at its comfortable disposal 30 thousand million dollars' surplus to be devoted to public works and social betterment to make our Nation the greatest and happiest in the world.

All these blessings we would have if we had only had the wisdom and patriotism to follow the advice of George Washington and the great Presidents who succeeded him, and to "keep free from foreign entanglements."

Benjamin Franklin said: "Experience keeps a dear school, yet fools will learn in no other."

Surely we as a people are not fools.

Surely we have learned something from the blood we have shed, the money we have wasted, the sufferings we have undergone.

Surely we have learned enough to keep our fingers out of the fire, our feet out of the trap of foreign entanglements.

Surely we have learned enough to keep free from the leagues of foreign nations and league courts and from all the jealousies and hatreds and angry disputes which distract and embroil European peoples.

France is daily increasing its armaments.

Italy is marching its soldiers up and down its frontiers in continual menace to its neighbors.

Germany is secretly arming for war.

Every one of these war-mad nations is preparing for another destructive struggle.

Why should we mingle in this maelstrom of hatred and fury?

We have tried to stop their armament, their preparations for war.

We could not do it.

If they have the will to war, we cannot stop the war.

All we can do is become involved in it.

All we can do is lose more of our fine young men and more of our wealth and plunge ourselves deeper into debt and disaster.

Have we another fifty thousand million dollars to spend in wars which do not concern us?

Have we another twelve thousand million dollars to loan to ungrateful allies?

Why not save our wealth—what is left of it—for home requirements?

Why not mind our own business at a time when our business needs minding?

Why not stay in our own land and keep our own peace and restore our own prosperity?

Why not keep out of the madhouse of foreign intrigue?

Why not respect the judgment and the injunction of our fathers who built this Nation to greatness?

Why not keep out of the League of Nations and the League Court, and "keep free from foreign entanglements"?

Let us be friendly to all the world, helpful to all the world, but let us think of America first—America, our country, our people, our home.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

ROGERS BOUND FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AFTER COURT ATTACK

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., January 10.—Will Rogers was bound for Washington today after delivering a blistering attack upon American entry into the League Court.

Cheered by 6,000 persons, Mr. Rogers departed from the humorous vein of his address here last night to make a serious plea against the League Court proposal as advanced by President Roosevelt a few days ago. The comedian was brought here by the Indianapolis Junior League, and he donated his services in behalf of the Riley Hospital for Children. Mr. Rogers told his audience:

"I told the President a few days ago that I didn't see any good in our entering the World Court.

"I do not believe the Members of Congress ought to be wasting time during this crisis to argue about the World Court. It looks to me they ought to be worrying about putting people to work, with millions needing relief like they do.

HITS INGRATITUDE

"We have shown the people of Europe in a billion ways that we care. We have had our men killed or crippled, we have lent them money; but if we said tomorrow that they didn't owe us a nickel, they wouldn't appreciate it.

"I told them in Paris that we didn't resent it so much because they hadn't paid us but because they didn't show appreciation for what we had done.

"Maybe this World Court won't get us in the League of Nations, but I have batted around Europe so much that I am suspicious.

"They say that this is a big Nation and we ought to take the moral leadership in the world, but I say there is need for moral leadership right here at home."

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under rule VIII is in order. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 396) to amend section 1180 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, with respect to usury, was announced as the first order of business on the calendar.

Mr. BULKLEY. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CROP PRODUCTION AND HARVESTING LOANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 859) to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1935, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 2, line 24, after the word "exceed", to insert "$500", and on page 3, at the end of line 2, to insert "$700", so as to make the paragraph read:

(b) The amount which may be loaned to any borrower pursuant to this act shall not exceed $500 unless, in the opinion of the Governor, the circumstances surrounding the loan are such as to warrant a larger amount, in which event the borrower shall be entitled to a loan not in excess of $700: Provided, however, That in any area certified by the President of the United States to the Governor as a distressed emergency area, the Governor may make loans without regard to the foregoing limitations, under such regulations and for such time as he may prescribe therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, on page 5, line 3, to strike out "$50,000,000" and insert "$100,000,000", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act. Any moneys so appropriated, and all collections of both principal and interest on loans made under this act, may be used by the Governor for all necessary administrative expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act and in collecting outstanding balances on crop production, seed and feed loans made under the act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1934, and for other purposes", approved February 23, 1934, or under prior legislation of the same general character.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] tell us about the proposed legislation and explain what the bill is?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it is exactly the same as legislation we have had for the last 5 years. It is the bill in usual form and the committee was unanimous in its report.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, does the bill involve seed loans?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Does it apply to all the States?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; to all the States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina what is the total amount carried in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. One hundred million dollars is authorized.

Mr. ROBINSON. The authorization is $100,000,000?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the measure been considered by the Farm Credit Administration?

Mr. SMITH. I think it has. The report shows that a bill of similar character was taken up and considered in the House.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think it would be well for the chairman of the committee to explain the difference between the bill now under consideration and the bill which we passed last year.

Mr. SMITH. The only difference is this: Members of the committee who represent the drought-stricken regions said we would have to have an additional amount for the purchase of seed and for feed; that there was absolutely a dearth of any seed or any facilities to purchase seed. After consideration of the matter for an hour or more the committee unanimously agreed, in view of the consideration given the bill last year and the rise in the prices of foodstuffs and the cost of living, as well as the rise in the price of seed corn and seed wheat, that it was necessary to increase the amount to $100,000,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the able chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry whether the bill covers seed loans?

Mr. SMITH. It does.

Mr. COSTIGAN. As provided in a bill (S. 25) for crop production and seed loans which I introduced early in the session?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina if there are any changes in the method of administration?

Mr. SMITH. None whatever. It is exactly in that respect as it was last year.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I notice on page 2, line 8, there is a provision as follows:

> Recording and other fees in connection with such loans shall not exceed $1 in any case, which shall be paid by the Farm Credit Association.

There is a great difference in the system of recordation in the various States. In some States it is only necessary to file the paper itself, while in other States it is necessary to record all the bills of sale and contracts. In some cases the recording fees run much over a dollar. I can see why the Farm Credit Administration should not pay more than a dollar, but under this provision of the bill the clerk of the court or officer having the recording in charge in the respective States could not collect more than a dollar in any event, even though the cost might be greater because of it being a very lengthy document.

Mr. SMITH. In previous years we have had so much complaint from various States that the recording fees were so different and in some of them so exorbitant that the committee felt it proper that we should fix a uniform fee. That is the reason why we have incorporated the provision in the bill. In some States the cost was ridiculously high, indeed was exorbitant. Therefore we cut it down to what we feel is a reasonable amount for the service to be rendered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. SMITH. Unless the Senator merely wants to ask a question I should like to make this statement before I yield. Never since I have been a member of the Committe on Agriculture and Forestry have I seen such unanimity as prevailed in my committee touching this particular bill. On the roll call there was not a dissenting voice. In addition to that each and every member of the committee expressed his hearty approval of the bill in the form in which it is presented. The members of my committee represent a very good cross-section of the country.

Further than this I do not care to make any statement, and I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from South Carolina the reason why the amount has been increased from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. I ask that question in the light of information which has come to me that perhaps the House will agree upon the sum of $40,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, this bill is an expression of the opinion of the Members of the Senate who are members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, several of whom have just been elected and sent here from their States. There was a percentage of our committee membership having a first experience in the Senate and on the committee. After canvassing the situation and considering the returns made by the Farm Credit Administration, it was found that the amount paid back is astonishingly high in view of our markets and the drought and all the unfortunate circumstances which surrounded crop production in the country.

The percentage of returns or repayments is astonishingly high. In several States this year it has been 100 percent. Even in the drought-stricken regions, where by virtue of adverse seasons they were practically stripped of anything like production, a remarkably large amount has been collected. There has been no action on the part of the Government in conserving the manhood and the self-respect of those who are unfortunate, no effort on our part, Mr. President, that compares to this. It keeps the man at home. It does not make a charity seeker of him. He borrows the money, makes the crop, and turns it over to the Government, and settles his bill so far as his crop will permit.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I had not understood that in any territory the reimbursements or returns from the funds loaned on this account had been 100 percent, but I know that in some of the districts the returns have approximated that figure. It is my information that there was unavoidably a considerable shortage due to exceptional conditions prevailing. I am wondering whether the Senator from South Carolina believes that the increase carried in the amendment which he has discussed, from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000, is imperative in view of the fact that the original amount asked for was $50,000,000.

Mr. SMITH. In answer let me say that every man who has given his personal attention to the condition of the average farmer knows that last year, when we set up another system which required them to furnish collateral, there were hundreds of them who could not qualify. There was never any provision made to meet that condition. That was shown to the committee, and we discussed it at the time.

This was not my amendment alone. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee that suffering small farmers, who make the bulk of our agricultural products, are entitled to have a sufficient amount to keep them at home and to allow them to meet the exigencies which are now so terrible.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the Farm Credit Administration have any opportunity to give the committee any information as to the amount required to meet the necessities of the approaching season?

Mr. SMITH. No. I believe they gave the House committee that information. We had no statement direct from them.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is an authorization and not an appropriation, I understand?

Mr. SMITH. It is an authorization.

Mr. ROBINSON. So when the appropriation shall come before us opportunity will be afforded to adjust the sum to the actual need?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

I want to say further, in consideration of the vast sums we are paying out for relief, that I challenge any Senator on this floor to cite any project we have undertaken which compares with this measure in practicability and in the conservation of the self-respect and manhood of our farmers. It is to the everlasting credit of the indigent, helpless individuals in my State, in Georgia, and in North Carolina that they have paid in excess of 98 percent of their borrowings in spite of low prices and in spite of the adverse season. In the West the unprecedented droughts have left many farmers even without seed to plant.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. MURPHY. The Government loaned $120,000,000 in corn loans, which have been repaid 100 percent, with a profit to the Government, or rather to the Commodity Credit Corporation, represented by interest, of $750,000.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was not involved in the seed loans.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, one item of perhaps lesser importance occurs to me in that provision of the measure which provides that—

All collections of both principal and interest on loans made under this act may be used by the Governor for all necessary administrative expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act and in collecting outstanding balances on crop production, seed and feed loans made under the act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1934, and for other purposes", approved February 23, 1934, or under prior legislation of the same general character.

I am wondering if it is not pretty broad authorization to enable them to use these funds for administration under any "prior acts of the same general character."

Mr. SMITH. They are collecting in 1935 for the loans made in 1934. They were collecting in 1934 on the loans made in 1933, just as they were collecting in 1933 on the loans made in 1932. The borrowers are paying their loans. If I had my way, I would have had the loans for each year kept in separate accounts. In 1934, if the farmers made a comparatively good crop and got a reasonable return, they not only repaid that year's loan from the Government but they paid something on the loan of the previous year. I know other Members of this body have had like experience. In my State some 10 or 15 percent has been collected from the delinquents from 1933 and 1934. I challenge any man here to compare that result, and the beneficial effect of this work in maintaining the American spirit, with any other thing we are doing here.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator has said, if he will indulge me, there is much detail that requires attention in connection with making and collecting these loans.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, there is; there is.

Mr. ROBINSON. As the Senator has stated, it is entirely true that when conditions permit, the borrowers go back to the obligations of previous seasons and take them up or reduce them; and I think that process should be encouraged rather than discouraged.

Mr. SMITH. I think so.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator a question before I discontinue my interruption of him?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has the Senator any information as to the annual cost of the administration of the seed loans?

Mr. SMITH. I have those figures, but failed to bring them over to the Senate Chamber this morning. I will have them incorporated either in today's RECORD or in tomorrow's RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should be glad to have those figures.

Mr. SMITH. The cost is remarkably low compared with the work done by these agents, who go from house to house to the borrowers, from time to time. The agents cooperate with the borrowers; and the expense to the Government of making the loans and collecting them is remarkably small, considering the vast area to be covered and the work to be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. And when one considers the fact that these loans are not made by the Farm Credit Administration unless the borrower is unable to secure a loan from any other source, I think it is truly remarkable that collections have been so large.

Mr. SMITH. I am glad the leader of our side has called attention to this matter. Under the terms of this bill, no one can get a lien loan, such as this is, unless he cannot qualify under the crop-production credit. That means that he has no collateral except his prospective crop, and he borrows this money on a lien on his current production; and in spite of the fact that he has no collateral, no assets to put up, the borrowers, including those in the drought region, paid in 1933 an average of 78 percent, I believe. We had the figure before the committee, furnished to us by the Department.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have here a newspaper clipping containing a statement recently issued by Judge James Tipton, regional manager of the Memphis emergency crop loan office, showing that at that time 90.39 percent of the loans made by the regional office in 1934 had been repaid, and the farmers in the nine States had paid back $14,556,360. Some of the notes do not mature until November 1; and a part of the area involved in this district has suffered severely from the drought.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the date of that statement?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A few days ago; not long ago. It contains the percentage paid of the amount loaned in each of the nine States.

Mr. ROBINSON. In all of which collections have been made since the statement was made?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes; and a number of the notes are not yet due.

Mr. ROBINSON. And payments are continuously made?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; they are continuously made; and, as I stated, a number of those notes are not yet due.

I ask to have this statement published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) News]

FARMERS IN SOUTH SHOWN AS HONEST—CROP LOAN OFFICE FIGURES REVEAL HIGH RATE OF OBLIGATIONS PAID

MEMPHIS, TENN.—Southern farmers are just about as honest as any set of folk on earth, contends James Tipton, regional manager of the Memphis emergency crop loan office.

And he had the figures Wednesday to bear out his contention.

His figures show that 90.39 percent of the regional office's 1934 loans have been repaid. The farmers have paid back $514,556,360, and some of the notes do not mature until November 1.

Collections, by States, thus far include:

Alabama—94.1 percent of 15,247 loans for $799,030.
Arkansas—82.77 percent of 26,355 loans for $1,570,285.
Florida—77.08 percent of 1,658 loans for $91,740.
Georgia—93.60 percent of 38,891 loans for $3,020,445.
Louisiana—88.61 percent of 21,607 loans for $1,189,340.
Mississippi—88.66 percent of 27,785 loans for $1,467,760.
North Carolina—90.58 percent of 34,817 loans for $2,691,760.
South Carolina—92.76 percent of 31,634 loans for $2,751,430.
Tennessee—78.14 percent of 13,792 loans for $744,445.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, having relation to the increased amount of this loan, it is to be said that the cost of feed and of seed is several hundred percent more now than it was a year ago, and that the need in individual cases is more acute.

In some 31 counties of my State the corn crop is a complete failure. There are townships which were dependent upon corn where not one single bushel of corn was harvested. The need of farmers there for feed and seed is acute; it is immediate.

No one can determine what the price of seed this season will be. If we had been in the market earlier, we would have been able to buy it much cheaper. The need in individual cases, we assume, will be larger than it was a year ago, due to the fact that many farmers have absolutely no seed whatsoever for spring planting.

When the bill gets into conference, and a more detailed study of the needs has been completed by the drought division of the Agricultural Administration, if the amount provided in this bill should be found to be excessive, I think it can be determined fairly in conference.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the few observations which I shall make are not directed against appropriations for the relief of the farmers of our country. I realize that they have been passing through a period of great distress and have been subjected to hardships and difficulties perhaps greater than those borne by many groups and classes of our citizens. I have favored and shall favor what I conceive to be legitimate and proper measures in aid of all branches of agriculture. I take this occasion, however, to challenge attention to the demands which are being made upon the Federal Government for enormous appropriations for almost every activity and industry. Many of these demands do not rest upon any proper foundation and cannot find support by reference to the Constitution of the United States. There are manifestations of a growing feeling that the Federal Government owes every individual a livelihood and that the obligation rests upon the Federal Government to engage in every form of industry and to furnish employment to all the people. In emergencies as that through which we have passed the Federal Government is warranted in giving aid and succor and to engage in activities which under ordinary circumstances could not be justified.

I fear that many of our citizens do not appreciate the limitations upon the Federal Government and the sources from which it must obtain revenues to meet its appropriations. It is not always appreciated by many of our citizens that appropriations made by Congress can only be met by imposing taxes upon the people. Perhaps I should modify that by stating that the Federal Government has authority to borrow money for legitimate purposes to meet the necessary expenses of the Government, but it is obvious that there must be a limit upon the borrowing power of the Government. If it imposes heavy burdens of taxes and then creates enormous deficits, the day will arrive when it will experience difficulty in disposing of its securities to meet deficits and expenditures.

Governments, like individuals, may impair their credit. We have recently witnessed the collapse of the credit of some municipalities and the appeals which have been made for Federal legislation to enable them to effect compensations with their creditors. I submit that one of the most imperative duties resting upon Congress is to ascertain the needs of the Government, to determine just what appropriations should be made, and before making them, ascertain the sources of revenue and determine how the appropriations are to be met. In other words, Congress should take stock and determine its assets and its liabilities; the sources from which revenue may be obtained and the amount that will be secured. It should determine what, if any, deficits will result, and then, after full investigation, decide the method by which such deficits shall be met.

I respectfully submit that Congress should prepare its budget; determine just what it will appropriate, and provide sound and rational plans under which there will be realized funds sufficient to meet the appropriations made.

I have been long enough in the Senate to know, however, that that course is seldom pursued and that admonitions against improvident, not to say extravagant, appropriations receive but little attention.

With the growing demands for Federal appropriations, and the pressure which is brought upon Congress by groups and organizations—powerful, aggressive, and active—barriers interposed to legislation to carry out such demands are often swept aside.

Without being critical of the committee reporting the bill before us, it seems to me that there should have been hearings and a comprehensive study made, if not a searching investigation, as to the need for an appropriation amounting to $100,000,000. The bill which was offered called for but $50,000,000, and so far as I am advised, without a full and complete investigation, it has been raised to $100,000,000. The fact that the committee unanimously favored the increase is not conclusive that the increase should have been made.

Undoubtedly the condition of the farmers—owing to the drought, crop failures, and the effects of the depression—is serious and doubtless justifies relief at the hands of Congress. But, I repeat, that the Senate should have supporting data when it is asked, with but limited debate and slight, if any opportunity upon their part to obtain complete information, to appropriate one hundred millions of dollars.

I invite the attention of the Senators to the fact that the expenses of the Federal Government have been enormously increased during the past few years. Not many years ago the entire expenses of the Government were less than a billion dollars. Since then the machinery of the Federal Government has grown to enormous proportions, the number of Federal employees has been greatly augmented, and the amount required to pay their compensation for the last fiscal year was in excess of one billion two hundred and fifty millions of dollars.

I confess that I look with considerable apprehension upon the rise of bureaucracy and the tremendous power which it exercises not only in executive fields but over the legislative branch of the Government.

The burdens of taxation have been greatly increased by reason of the multiplication of offices, bureaus, and executive and administrative agencies. Not only has the Federal Government's expenses increased by leaps and bounds but the expenditures of States and their political subdivisions have assumed alarming proportions. States, counties, cities, school districts have bonded indebtedness aggregating many billions of dollars; and, as Senators know, the national debt has greatly increased beyond the high limits which it attained during the World War. I do not have the figures before me, but I have no hesitancy in stating that the obligations of the Federal Government and the States and their political subdivisions exceed $50,000,000,000. Appeals are being made by many taxpayers for relief—indeed, in many of the States tax delinquencies have reached enormous proportions.

I have received communications from various parts of the United States asking me to support legislation under which loans would be granted to the owners of real estate in order that they might meet tax delinquencies, some of which covered a period of 4 or 5 years. It is difficult for legislative bodies to deal with this problem when a large part of the people are demanding increased appropriations, and some of the suffering taxpayers are demanding that the burdens of taxation shall be lightened. I have seen many statements to the effect that the expenditures upon the part of the Federal Government and the State government and their political subdivisions, exceed 25 percent of the earnings of all the people of the United States.

Certain it is that there must be retrenchment and reform in the administration of National and State Governments. The tax burdens must be diminished, and the waste and extravagance found in too many of the agencies of the Federal and State Governments must be eliminated.

I appreciate, however, appeals for reduction in appropriations by the present Congress will be in vain. I expect when the final chapter shall have been written dealing with the activities of this session of Congress it will chronicle appropriations in excess of those at any session of Congress in the history of the Republic except possibly during the World War period of 1917–19.

We are regaled almost daily with statements made by executive agencies and administrative employees concerning measures which are to be passed and appropriations which are to be made. A stranger coming to the United States would assume that the functions of Congress with respect to appropriations were negligible, that executive departments and administrative agencies, bureaus, and agencies, and what not, constitute the legislative branch of the Government, or at least are the possessors of the taxing prerogatives and the authority to levy and collect taxes.

The practice of employees in executive branches and in administrative agencies of the Federal Government in drafting bills carrying appropriations and announcing policies is increasing. Much of our legislation, Mr. President, instead of being devised by Congress, is formulated by executive agencies, by departments, bureaus, and subordinate organizations of an administrative character; and I might add that from these departments and executive and administrative agencies propaganda emanates in favor of the formulated plans, or policies, or measures, and active and aggressive representatives appeal to the people in various parts of the United States to join in securing the legislation and appropriations so formulated and prepared.

It has been suggested that legislation be enacted to restrain executive and administrative agencies from formulating legislation except upon request of Congress, or of becoming traveling salesmen and propagandists throughout the United States urging the people to back and support the policies and measures which they have originated.

Mr. President, I appeal to Members upon this side of the aisle to oppose extravagant and needless appropriations. I do not forget that the Democratic platform upon which the present administration was elected pledged the party to a reduction in the burdens of taxation. My recollection is that the platform demanded a 25-percent reduction. Certainly, with the mounting costs of the Government and the serious financial condition in which people in many parts of the country find themselves, every efforts should be made to reduce the expenses of the Government and to that extent lighten the burdens resting upon the people.

I do not appeal to Senators upon the other side of the aisle because I appreciate that the appeal would be in vain. I have no doubt that they will support the various appropriation bills that are reported, though it is obvious they will add to the burdens of the people and swell the growing deficit to the extent of billions of dollars.

I have stated upon several occasions that I regretted that upon the other side of the aisle there was not a vigorous, aggressive, and fighting minority that would challenge attention to the delinquencies—if such there be—of the majority party, and who would fight against and who would oppose socialistic tendencies and policies strengthening bureaucracy and weakening democratic institutions.

Mr. President, when communities and nations pass through periods of depression, it is inevitable that forces would be developed which would lead to unrest and serious questioning of what had formerly been regarded as sound economic and political principles and policies. But it is important that sound and just political and economic policies be not forgotten or weakened.

Mr. President, before resuming my seat I direct attention to a provision in the bill read by the Senator from Colorado a few moments ago, and I move to strike out the sentence which reads as follows:

and all collections of both principal and interest on loans made under this act, may be used by the Governor for all necessary administrative expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act and in collecting outstanding balances on crop production, seed and feed loans made under the act entitled "An act to provide for loans to farmers for crop production and harvesting during the year 1934, and for other purposes", approved February 23, 1934, or under prior legislation of the same general character.

Just another word. Mr. President, we have repeatedly condemned continuing appropriations or appropriations which gave to executive departments the authority to utilize funds which they may have collected or obtained through prior appropriations. We have considered it wise to compel the departments to submit estimates at the beginning of each Congress for the expenses of their respective bureaus and departments for the ensuing year. And we make appropriations to meet those expenditures. We have not approved of the plan permitting them to reach into the Treasury, or to refrain from turning into the Treasury funds which may have come into their hands or which are paid into the Treasury from prior loans or from prior sources.

When we make appropriations of that character, after they have submitted their estimates, we know what the expenses of the various departments will be; but if we enact legislation of the character of the pending legislation it is impossible to determine what the expenditures may be for clerk hire or for administrative purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as I see it, there is a moral obligation upon the Congress to enact the pending legislation providing credit, by way of loans, whereby a peculiar class of our agricultural population may obtain the means of subsistence during the coming year. So long as the Government pursues the policy of crop control it must also pursue the policy of providing for that portion of the population whose credit is destroyed by reason of that policy. I think I could undertake to maintain that as a moral as well as an economic and humanitarian proposition.

Let me give to Senators the facts as to my State. There were, at the most recent date of a report by the authorities, 66,000 people on Federal relief in North Carolina. Thirty-three thousand of those 66,000 were people who heretofore had made their living in agricultural pursuits. However, when the Congress enacts legislation which cuts down a small farmer's right to sell his cotton or tobacco to as low as a few bales of cotton or a few hundred pounds of tobacco, all the remainder being taxed at from 50 percent with regard to cotton to 25 percent with regard to tobacco, it places that farmer where he cannot get credit anywhere on earth except from the Federal Government.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MURPHY. My information is that the first of the seed loans was made in 1928, before the adoption of the present policies of this administration.

Mr. BAILEY. I will agree to that. The first of the seed loans was made in 1928. However, that does not affect the moral obligation in 1935 under the conditions I have just narrated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. One minute, if the Senator pleases. I shall not undertake to argue whether or not the policy in 1928 was sound. I was not then in the Senate. I shall not undertake to argue whether or not the policy in 1933 was sound. My point, however, is that Congress cannot with one hand deprive 33,000 of the farming population of the means of obtaining credit, and then withhold from them the credit upon which they must depend, and under circumstances in which the President of the United States has recently notified us that the Government must abandon the work of relief. My point is that notwithstanding a relatively good situation in North Carolina with respect to agriculture, without the loans in question there would be in the present year 33,000 of farming population thrown out of relief and into an order of things which we call agricultural control, in which they would have no means of credit whatever, and they would go back to their lands with no opportunity to produce the means of livelihood.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator if it is not a fact that representatives from the Southern States, notably the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], speaking, as I understood, for the cotton producers of the South—put through Congress a bill under the terms of which it was claimed the price of cotton would be greatly increased, and though perhaps the number of bales produced might be diminished, the price at which the bales would be sold would more than compensate the farmers for the diminution in their production. I will also ask the Senator if it is not a fact that after a plebiscite was taken in at least some of the States—as I understood, in all the cotton-producing States—under the auspices of the Department of Agriculture, an overwhelming vote was registered in favor of that policy, which I denounced and which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] denounced, but which apparently the cotton producers of the South believed was a wise and sound economic and industrial policy.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should be satisfied to answer each of the inquiries in the affirmative. However, while that matter is before us momentarily I will say that the price of cotton in the South or elsewhere has not increased. The gold price obtained today—and that is the price by which we test it in comparison with any of the prices obtaining prior to the devaluation—is 7¾ cents a pound. The domestic price, or the price in American currency due to devaluation, is 12½ cents a pound. The price of tobacco today in the world market—the gold price—is 15 cents a pound. My authority for each of these statements is Mr. Secretary Wallace, of the Department of Agriculture. The average price for tobacco in American currency for the season—which has not yet come to an end, but has practically expired—is 26¾ cents in American currency and 15 cents in gold; and any intelligent comparison with a view to ascertaining the beneficial effects of the legislation to which the Senator from Utah has referred would necessarily be made in terms of gold value and not American currency value. If I am not mistaken, the present price of 12½ cents for a pound of cotton and of 26½ cents for a pound of tobacco—they being the average—is due to the devaluation of the dollar in terms of gold, and not to the legislation which was put forward in Congress as the means of lifting those prices.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I voted for the so-called "Bankhead bill" with a great deal of reluctance, but I voted for it because of the fact that practically all the Senators from the South were in favor of it. Reports have come to me since that time, however, that the effect of that bill was that it was curtailing, practically cutting off, our export trade in cotton. What does the Senator from North Carolina say with reference to that? How has the legislation affected the export of cotton?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I did not rise with a view to discussing those questions, though I hope to do so later. I will, however, answer the Senator's inquiry.

I think the impression that the legislation of the last session had the effect of reducing our export trade in cotton is not well founded. I realize that it might be advantageous to me to argue otherwise; but let us argue the facts. The world production of cotton outside the United States had been rising steadily for a long period before the Bankhead Act was ever thought of. If Senators will take the data which I have, which have been issued by the Department of Agriculture, they will find that the production of cotton outside the United States was about 7,000,000 bales in 1920; and it rose in a very orderly fashion, until in the most recent year it exceeded 13,000,000 bales. The process whereby the world consumption of cotton has tended to increase the production of cotton outside the United States antedated the agricultural legislation of the last three sessions of the Congress. So I think I have answered the Senator's question, so far as he would care for me to do so at this time.

Mr. President, I have another remark to make about this loan. I am proud of the record which has been made by the farmers of North Carolina. To be sure, the men who borrowed this money were men of less means—what we call the small farmers; they had been dependent upon "time" merchants, and I fear they had been paying a great deal more interest than they were due to pay. In 1917 the general assembly of my State passed an act forbidding those who were then lending to farmers to charge more than 15 percent per annum. That act is now on the statute books. I fear that under the conditions which obtained prior to this beneficial legislation there may have been grounds for complaint; that men who paid so great an interest—the difference between the cash price and the "time" price, as we say in our section—may not have made a record so creditable as they would have made if they had been required to pay only 5 or 6 percent.

However, since this legislation has been on the books the humble classes of the farmers in my Commonwealth have borrowed freely, and I am proud to say they have paid back more than 99 percent of every dollar the Government has advanced to them. In the light of that circumstance, there cannot be any imputation that they are disposed to deadbeat the Government or that they are not disposed to pay their debts. They paid 99 percent in 1933, when conditions were hard; they are paying 100 percent this year. The Government loses no money in North Carolina by this necessary legislation.

I recur, Mr. President, to my proposition. There may not have been the moral obligation in 1928; there was probably not a moral obligation in 1933, but there was a humanitarian necessity when all the credit was destroyed down there. Today, however, there is a moral obligation resting upon the Congress which passed the legislation, the effect of which was to deprive the humble class of farmers in North Carolina of the means of credit. The moral obligation rests upon us who took the credit from them to place it in their hands. Otherwise the obligation will be upon this Government or upon the State of North Carolina to maintain with doles at least 33,000 people who, if given half a chance, will maintain themselves and ask of no one odds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was not aware that the Senator from Utah had offered an amendment. Did he offer to strike out certain parts of the bill?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 5, after the word "act", it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have listened to all this debate. Senators have been making rather lengthy speeches under rule VIII, which limits debate to 5 minutes. I am very much opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah and, while I am criticizing other Senators for taking a long time, I expect to quit in 5 minutes.

Mr. President, we cannot compare the conditions now with those which existed in preceding years. Bear in mind also that this is an authorization and not an appropriation. It would be a sad thing if we should by the fundamental law neglect to authorize and provide an appropriation of a sufficient amount with which to buy seed. We can regulate the amount when we come to the appropriation. It does not follow that $100,000,000 is going to be used but, from all the information we now have, there is no comparison whatever of conditions this year with conditions in other years when we authorized or appropriated $50,000,000.

In a large portion of the West, and I understand the same condition exists in many sections of the South, the farmers produced absolutely nothing—not a green spear of grass is growing and, in a great many instances, they have no means with which to put in a crop.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have only 5 minutes. The Senator had half an hour.

Mr. KING. The Senator is in error in his view as to the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I have only 5 minutes. I inquire if my time is up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Senator will be notified when his time is up.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. Let me be notified when it is up.

From those whose business it will be to loan this money in that section of the country with which I am somewhat familiar, I have received numerous letters and statements that nothing heretofore can be compared to the conditions which exist this year in a great portion of what has been the real bread basket of the Nation, where nothing has been produced, where no crops will be planted unless the farmers, to a very great number, are able to borrow money from the Federal Government in order to buy seed. There is no gainsaying that; I do not think there is any doubt about it.

This bill provides that not a cent shall be loaned to any farmer who can borrow from the banks or from private sources; but, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has pointed out, there are thousands of farmers for whom it is impossible to secure any money from private sources, and unless this bill shall pass and provide a sufficient amount, there will be hundreds of thousands of farmers who have the land, who have the machinery, who have the time, but have no way in which to buy seed. They have not raised a bushel of grain.

Mr. BORAH. And it will be necessary to put them on the relief roll.

Mr. NORRIS. And as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] suggests to me, they will probably have to be put on the relief roll. There is nothing for them to do unless they can get seed planted in order that they may raise a crop. Therefore, I think this is not only a necessary bill but it is one that must be disposed of without any delay. I ask Senators not to kill this bill by talking until 2 o'clock, but to let us pass it before that time under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I very much appreciate the wisdom and purpose of the pending bill. I have supported similar legislation at every session of Congress when the subject has been before us. The question with me is whether or not the language of the bill provides that loans may be made for fall crops. In my State we have what we call "fall crops" or early spring crops, which are planted in September, October, and November, partially harvested during the same year, and then over into the early spring of the following year. I should like to know from the chairman of the committee if in this bill conditions of that character have been unquestionably taken care of.

Mr. SMITH. In 1934 the identical question to which the Senator refers was decided by the Department, and it was held that the case to which he refers, namely, crops which are planted in the fall to be gathered in the succeeding spring, come under the purview of this language, so that a crop planted in 1934 and gathered in 1935 was eligible to a loan just as was a crop planted in 1934 and gathered in 1934. The language of the bill takes care of that situation. In the report given me by the Department, figures are given as to crops planted in 1934 and completed in 1934, showing the amount of the loans, the amount collected, and the percentage yet due. Similar figures are given for crops planted in 1934, which are to mature and be sold in 1935. The language of the bill, under the ruling of the Department, amply takes care of the situation referred to by the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is a matter in which I was very much interested on account of conditions in my State, and the customary period of planting. I have proposed an amendment, to be sure, that that situation was taken care of, which proposed amendment went to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. However, the chairman of the committee assures me that the committee had that situation in mind and considered it at the time they were making up their report, and that it has been taken care of. So, with the understanding that this bill does provide for loans for crops which may be planted in the latter part of the year 1935 and harvested in the early part of 1936, I am, of course, glad to give support to the proposed legislation and appreciate the fact that that particular feature has been taken care of by the committee.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment, on page 5, in lines 13 and 14, to strike out the words "or under prior legislation of the same general character."

I may say to my friend from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that he utterly misconceived the purpose of my former amendment. It did not deal at all with the fifty million or one hundred million dollars, but merely challenged attention to what I conceive to be an evil which the Senate over and over again has recognized, namely, of giving to the Department authority to take the funds that might come from some revolving source and utilize them in paying various departmental expenses. The amendment which I am now offering deals with this question.

I propose to strike out the words "or under prior legislation of the same general character." If that provision should be permitted to remain, then the Department could take all the funds that may come in from any source in connection with loans, and employ as many persons as they desire, without the need of submitting estimates to the Bureau of the Budget for obtaining funds to meet their expenses. I am perfectly willing to give the Department of Agriculture all the money they need to carry out the purposes of the legislation, but to permit them to take funds that may come into their possession from loans or from prior legislation, and use such moneys to pay expenses, in addition to the appropriations which we make for that purpose, it seems to me is highly improper.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I want to point out that it is not only money that may come in from collections, but the appropriation itself may be so used. In other words, the entire $100,000,000 may be diverted to other uses without making use of a single penny of it for the very purposes of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think there is a misinterpretation of the language. We know there are circumstances under which the departments, under our general practice, have to go into debt, as it were, and then submit an estimate for a deficiency appropriation. This provision of the bill simply means that if the amount appropriated for the purpose of lending to the farmers should become so depleted that those engaged in the work of collections would otherwise have to carry on without compensation, they could be paid out of this fund.

I am sorry I did not bring the statement with me this morning, but I shall incorporate in the RECORD tomorrow a meticulous account of every dollar spent, for what purpose spent, and out of what funds spent, so that the Senate may be advised of the fact that this loan, starting in 1928 and continuing to this time, has been as wisely, economically, and beneficially used as any other fund appropriated for a governmental purpose.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, was not this same language contained in the bill which we passed last year?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the same language.

Mr. HATCH. And in the bill passed in the year prior to that?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. It was the same language verbatim et literatim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any further amendments to be offered? If not, the question is, Shall the bill be engrossed, and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE

The bill (S. 267) for the relief of certain officers and employees of the Foreign Service of the United States who, while in the course of their respective duties, suffered losses of personal property by reason of catastrophies of nature was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Matthew E. Hanna, American Minister to Nicaragua, the sum of $25,368.58, of which the sum of $25,215.50 represents the value of reasonable and necessary personal property lost as a result of the earthquake at Managua, Nicaragua, March 31, 1931, and the sum of $153.08 represents the amount of money and vouchers destroyed when the contents of the safe in the Legation were burned.

To Willard L. Beaulac, secretary of the American Legation at Managua, Nicaragua, the sum of $1,006.82, such sum representing the value of reasonable and necessary personal property lost as a result of the earthquake at Managua, Nicaragua, March 31, 1931.

To Marion P. Hoover, clerk in Legation at Managua, Nicaragua, the sum of $80, such sum representing the value of reasonable and necessary personal property lost as a result of the earthquake at Managua, Nicaragua, March 31, 1931: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent of any claim thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with any such claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated for any claim in this act in excess of 10 percent of such claim on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000. The aforestated amounts shall be considered in full settlement of the aforesaid claims.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE IN PETROLEUM

The bill (S. 1190) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in petroleum and its products by prohibiting the shipment in such commerce of petroleum and its products produced in violation of State law, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question before the bill is taken up. I understand this is a bill designed to obviate the effect, or rather to overcome the effect, of the decision of the Supreme Court in the oil case?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. I really have not had time to read the bill. It must necessarily be very important. I shall not object to its present consideration, but I should like to have the Senator explain the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I concur in the statement that the bill ought to be analyzed. I am sure the Senator from Texas is prepared to do that.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is conversant with the rule that on Monday morning 5 minutes only may be taken in explanation or discussion of a bill. The morning hour concludes at 2 o'clock. Is it desired by the Senator to bring up this important measure under such a strict limitation of debate?

Mr. CONNALLY. The bill is on the calendar. I have not been able to find any real objection to it. I had hoped to get it through the Senate today.

Mr. McNARY. A number of Senators are absent today. This is an important measure. Time for discussion is limited under the rule. It occurs to me that the Senator should wait until some future day, perhaps tomorrow, when by giving notice the bill can be taken up when there is no limitation on debate and no limitation of the time that can be devoted to discussion and consideration of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator from Oregon agree that we may take up the bill tomorrow?

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection now to its immediate consideration except that I should have to suggest the absence of a quorum. Only 5 minutes is allowed for discussion, and the rule has been invoked. I think we should have some general information with respect to the bill. We should have some notice that it is to come up at some time when we shall not be limited by a rule of the Senate as to the time we may devote to its consideration and to debate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it will be in order to proceed to consideration of the bill tomorrow without the limitation to which the Senator from Oregon refers, so that the Senate may be afforded the opportunity at that time to consider the bill and discuss it without any limitation of debate. I suggest, however, that the Senator from Texas might make his explanation now or at least consume 5 minutes in making an explanation, and then, if the Senator from Oregon desires the bill to go over, I think it should be passed over.

Mr. McNARY. I want to accommodate the Senator, but that would hardly meet the situation, because I would have to suggest the absence of a quorum. Secondly, I do not think the Senator from Texas could explain it in 5 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am sure the Senator from Oregon could understand it in 5 minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The suggestion of the Senator from Oregon is not intended as a reflection on the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I quite agree this is a very important measure; but I see no reason why an explanation should not be made now and, if not completed, resumed at some subsequent time.

Mr. McNARY. I am sure the Senator from Texas would not want to be confined to 5 minutes. I would ask unanimous consent that the Senator might have until 2 o'clock or any time he wants beyond 2 o'clock for the explanation. I do not want to limit the Senator unnecessarily to 5 minutes to explain the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to serve notice, if necessary, that tomorrow I shall move to proceed to consideration of the measure.

Mr. McNARY. There will be no objection on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator wishes to make explanation now, there can be no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining without amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Purely for the purpose of enabling and urging Senators to look into it, I will make a brief statement at this time, because unless such a statement shall be made there will be Senators here tomorrow who have not read the bill and who will plead for another postponement.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, does the Senator intend now to proceed with his explanation? I think that is wise. I have the decision of the Supreme Court in my hand. I have been trying to read it with some degree of understanding. I am interested in the explanation which may be made.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that 10 minutes be afforded the Senator from Texas at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Texas has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator begins his explanation, I may say that I have just read the bill in the last 3 or 4 minutes. There is one matter to which I think the Senator should give particular attention. I understand this is an effort of the National Government to prevent the shipment of so-called "contraband oil" in interstate commerce. The question I should like to have the Senator consider is whether the National Government can exclude from the channels of interstate commerce an article which in and of itself is not deleterious or objectionable but has been made so by some action of a State legislature.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that that is a very important aspect of the matter, but I am sure that in 10 minutes, in conformity to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, I would not be able to go into that matter thoroughly, as well as into the mechanics of the bill; so I hope the Senator will pardon me if I do not enter upon an exhaustive discussion of that particular matter at this time.

Under the National Industrial Recovery Act there was a provision in section 9 (c) which, in short, simply authorized the President to prohibit the interstate shipment of oil and its products for use in violation of any State law or the rule or regulation of any State body or agency having jurisdiction over that matter. That provision was attacked in certain cases before the Supreme Court, those being known as the "Amazon and the Panama Petroleum Corporation cases." The Supreme Court held—and I think properly so—that the Congress did not possess the power to delegate authority to the President to put the prohibition in effect or not in effect as he might determine. In other words, the Court held that was a delegation of the legislative function and not the exercise of an executive power to be exercised under a certain standard which the Congress should establish. The Court indicated, in harmony with other decisions heretofore made, that had the Congress set up a standard or a measure by which the President could determine when and when not the shipment of oil should be prohibited the act would probably have been held valid. In essence, that is the situation which confronts us.

The pending measure was drawn in collaboration with the legal authorities of the Department of the Interior and has been carefully scrutinized by the oil production board and their legal staff. They, as well as the Committee on Mines and Mining and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who also had a part in the drafting of the bill, are convinced that the present measure obviates the objections which were urged to the act before the Supreme Court.

In the first section of the bill there is a declaration of the policy of the Congress. One of the suggestions in the decision of the Supreme Court was that Congress had not declared any particular policy but had merely delegated its authority to the President. The declaration of policy here is that in order to remove the burden of interference with interstate commerce by contraband oil, and in order to cooperate with the various States to that end, the Congress prohibits the interstate shipment of oil and oil products when the particular oil has been produced or refined or handled in violation of some State law or some valid regulation or order of the State commission.

While the Supreme Court did not in so many words hold that the Congress had authority to prohibit it, per se, there is every suggestion in the opinion that in the original case if Congress itself had prohibited the interstate shipment of this oil it would have been better.

A part of section 1 is a definition of terms. It sets up the meaning of the term "contraband oil" as it is employed in the bill, as well as defining what is engaging in interstate or foreign commerce.

Section 2 then absolutely prohibits the shipment in interstate or foreign commerce of oil produced in violation of State law or regulations. It also undertakes to protect common carriers who may transport oil, and makes them amenable to this act rather than to penalty suits for failure to accept such shipments.

Section 3 of the bill prescribes that the President or his agents may prescribe suitable rules and regulations to effectuate the enforcement of the act, and it specifically authorizes the reestablishment of certain boards which heretofore have operated under section 9 (c). Those were boards known as "tender boards." In other words, persons or corporations who desired to ship oil in interstate commerce tendered the oil to these boards, and they passed upon its eligibility prior to the commerce moving. It was found that these boards were very effective, and probably had done more to enforce the laws with regard to the shipment of oil than any other agency which had been provided. The bill also provides that in the enforcement of the act books and reports and records may be required to be kept and may be examined by these boards.

Section 4 is the penalty section; and subsection (b) of section 4 is a provision that removes any doubt as to the Government's right to proceed by injunction or other summary civil process in the enforcement of the act. In addition to the criminal penalties the Government is given authority to proceed by injunction or summary writ. There are some cases in which the point has been raised that since the Government has the legal remedy of prosecution, it has no equitable remedy by injunction or other writ.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to have the Senator distinguish this line of argument from the child-labor cases. As I understand, the Supreme Court in those cases held that we could not prevent the shipment of clothes or shoes made by factories. I am wondering how we can prevent the shipment of oil when we cannot stop the shipment of shoes or clothes made in factories. It seems to me a much clearer case was presented by the Child Labor Act than is presented by this measure.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that I have not read those decisions recently; but this is what the Supreme Court decided in the child-labor law case:

Congress had passed an act prohibiting the interstate shipment of any article produced within a State by the employment of child labor. When the Supreme Court passed upon that particular case it held that the production of shoes or any other article within the States was clearly within the control of the States themselves, and that under the interstate-commerce clause Congress could not prohibit their shipment until after they were produced and had entered into commerce, and therefore that we had no right to dictate to the States anything whatever regarding their production. The difference between that case and this case is that in this case we do not undertake to prohibit the shipment of the article until it has first been condemned and made contraband by the laws of the States themselves; and then, as a matter of cooperation with the States, the Federal Government says, "Since you produced this article in defiance of State law, we will not permit you to evade that law by resorting to shipping it in interstate commerce." So there is quite a distinction, I will say to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I have not read the case for some time. I am glad to have the Senator's statement on the subject.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will reread that decision, I think he will see that the Supreme Court held that the Federal Government had no jurisdiction whatever until the article had got into commerce; and since its production in the factory was purely within the State jurisdiction, the Federal Government could not utilize anything that happened with respect to its production, which was not in itself illegal, to affect its shipment in interstate commerce. I think the Senator from Arkansas will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. President, if any Senator desires to ask a question regarding this measure, I shall be glad to answer it. If not, I do not care to consume any more of the time of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. DIETERICH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Arthur Roe, of Illinois, to be United States attorney for the eastern district of Illinois, to succeed Paul F. Jones, resigned.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the following nominations:

C. Porter Kuykendall, of Pennsylvania, now a Foreign Service officer of class 6 and a consul, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service; and Dorsey Gassaway Fisher, of Maryland, now a Foreign Service officer, unclassified, and a vice consul of career, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

NOMINATION OF HORACE G. BODWELL—RECOMMITTAL

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, on last Friday the Senate confirmed the nomination of Horace G. Bodwell to be postmaster at Arlington, Kans. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that nomination was confirmed be reconsidered and that the nomination be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE WORLD COURT

The Senate resumed the consideration of Executive A (71st Cong., 3d sess.), protocols concerning adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice, the pending question being the amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG to the resolution of adherence as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adams | Connally | Hayden | Pittman |
| Ashurst | Coolidge | Johnson | Pope |
| Austin | Copeland | Keyes | Radcliffe |

| Clark | Hatch | O'Mahoney | Wheeler |

Mr. LEWIS. I reannounce the absence of Senators previously announced this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, only a strong conviction could move me to reenter the debate upon the subject which is now before the Senate. It is a subject which has been discussed in this Chamber at different times for the past 12 years. It recalls what Edmund Burke said when he opened the debate on the question of American taxation:

For 9 years—

He said—

session after session, we have been lashed round and round this miserable circle of occasional arguments and temporary expedients.

It is some 12 years since the debate opened on this subject. Those of us who have taken some part in the debate during that long period feel that in all probability we have exhausted the subject. Therefore we naturally enter upon the discussion again with some hesitancy, knowing that we shall not likely be able to add anything new to the discussion.

The proposal, however, is here. To my mind it is one of transcendent moment, and I cannot forbear restating my opposition to our adherence to the Permanent Court of International Justice. I feel also that things have transpired which will enable us to apply certain principles and conclusively establish that the Court is not alone a court, but an advisory tribunal controlled by or responsive to political influences.

Mr. President, if it were not for the advisory jurisdiction of this Court, I should not detain the Senate in a discussion of the proposal. If this were a judicial body, where nations or governments could go and voluntarily submit matters for judicial determination, I should have no objection to the Court. If it were a body in which parties litigant, as it were, could take their controversies, I should feel entirely different in regard to it.

It has been a matter rather unpleasant to me during these long years to have it said, as has often been said, particularly in the press, that I am opposed to the settlement of international controversies through judicial tribunals. I have never entertained that view. I do not entertain that view now. I have been an advocate of international judicial bodies.

However, when we come to the advisory jurisdiction of the Court a wholly different question is presented, the picture is changed, the problems for us to consider are wholly different. We are then, in my judgment, not dealing with a judicial tribunal such as we contemplate when we use that term. We are dealing with an advisory tribunal, a tribunal which has for its purpose in the exercise of that particular jurisdiction that of giving counsel and advice and rendering advisory opinions which amount to giving counsel in particular matters, and it is the advisory jurisdiction to which I invite the attention of my colleagues today. Bear in mind that it is the advisory jurisdiction around which this entire debate has raged for 12 years. Had it not been for the advisory jurisdiction of the Court, I am of the opinion that the matter would have been settled long ago. But this advisory jurisdiction of the Court has given us much concern—concern to the supporters of the Court and to the opponents of the Court. The able men who have advocated our adherence to the Court have, through all these years, labored earnestly, ably, patriotically to curtail, as they thought they could, the jurisdiction of the Court in this respect so as to protect the interests of the United States.

The real matter of controversy between us during all these years has been whether it was practicable, whether possible so to limit the operation of the advisory jurisdiction of the Court as to protect the interests of the United States. There were those who thought they could do that. There are others of us who do not believe it has been done or that it can be done. It is our belief that, throw around the advisory jurisdiction whatever safeguards you may, it still remains an advisory tribunal into which political matters will inevitably intrude, into which economic matters will likewise inevitably intrude, and into which national feeling will inevitably intrude and control. Therefore, when we are considering this Court as to its advisory jurisdiction we are not considering a tribunal engaged in the determination of a purely judicial or legal question; we are considering a tribunal which has almost the relationship to a political body that the Attorney General of the United States has to the political side of the Government of the United States.

I shall today confine my remarks entirely to an analysis of the advisory jurisdiction, its scope, its power, the source of its power, its control, and the effects of the advisory jurisdiction.

It has many times been said that in opposing this Court—those of us who do—we are opposing that which has been advocated in the United States by leaders for years and years. It has been said that the United States has been a leader in the advocacy of judicial tribunals for the settlement of international disputes, and now one is proposed and we are retracing our steps, as it were, by refusing to follow out, and to its end, the logic of the position which we have heretofore taken. I invite the Senate's attention to the fact that no leading American prior to the time of the advisory jurisdiction created here, ever advocated any such Court as this, ever advocated any advisory power being attached to the Court. This Court is not an American product and springs from no American proposal.

On the other hand, the great leaders in this movement, as I shall show the Senate, have from the beginning earnestly opposed the attaching of this jurisdiction to the World Court. It has never been a part of the conception of a court as advocated by the United States, of the leaders in international affairs with reference to judicial settlements. On the other hand, it has been always opposed.

Perhaps Mr. Elihu Root may claim precedence, at least may claim great honor as having been one of the leaders in the matter of arbitration in international affairs and in the matter of setting up judicial tribunals for the settlement of international controversies. He has been cited over and over again as the real author of the concept which we are here discussing today. But in order that that may be true you must wholly eliminate from this Court the advisory jurisdiction which we are now discussing. Mr. Root, as the Senate knows, was one of the original committee which formulated this Court under the invitation of the League of Nations. At the time that it was being formed he took occasion to declare that he was—

Opposed to the Court's having the right to give an advisory opinion.

That took place at the time of the organization. It was in perfect harmony with his entire record with reference to the creation of judicial tribunals. He followed that by saying that in his opinion this advisory jurisdiction of the Court was a—Violation of all juridical principles.

It can hardly be said that the great advocate of settlement of international disputes through judicial processes was an advocate of this Court as it is being presented to the Senate at this time.

Mr. Root saw clearly that involved in the advisory jurisdiction was an element of danger, not only to the Court itself but an element of danger to the advancement of the cause of settlement of questions through judicial processes. He also recognized that it being there, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to control it.

I should say, in passing, that Mr. Root is an advocate of adherence to the World Court at this time. I doubt if he has ever changed his mind on the subject of the advisory jurisdiction. I do not think it is any violation of confidence to say that he had lunch with me in the Foreign Relations Committee the day before he left for Europe on his last trip, when he brought back what is known as the "Root-Hurst protocol." I said to him at the time that my objection to this Court lies in its advisory jurisdiction, and he stated that undoubtedly it was a mistake, but that he had the hope that they would in time see the mistake and eliminate the advisory jurisdiction. I did not understand that he had changed his mind with reference to the principle itself. My feeling then was and now is that if we approve this advisory jurisdiction it will become permanent; it fits into the European conception of a court, half law and half politics.

Another leader in this matter of the settlement of international controversies by judicial process was and is Hon. John Bassett Moore. I think it would be within the truth to say that he is today, although much in retirement, the leading authority in the United States and one of the leading authorities in the world upon international matters relating particularly to questions of international law, and relating to the subject of setting up and maintaining tribunals for the settlement of controversies by judicial process. He was for a time a member of this tribunal. John Bassett Moore in the very beginning of the movement for the creation of the World Court, speaking with reference to the advisory jurisdiction of the Court, said:

That the exercise of such a function is at variance with the fundamental design of the Permanent Court of International Justice which was to advance the application between nations of the principle and method of judicial decision.

What does he mean where he says that it is at variance with the fundamental design of a court of international justice? He means that this matter of injecting advice and counsel is at war with our theory of a court where men sit in judicial capacity, moving not until litigants bring a question of controversy to them.

Again, he says that the advisory opinions give the Court a function—

Admittedly inconsistent with and potentially destructive of the judicial character with which the Court has undoubtedly been invested.

"Inconsistent with and potentially destructive." I would have the Senate bear that sentence in mind as I proceed to discuss some of the proof that it is potentially destructive of the Court itself. It is potentially destructive of the very design and purpose of an international court. It will undermine confidence in the Court. It will bring it into the whirlpool of European politics and degrade the whole question of political adjustments.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the able leader of the majority, when he spoke upon this subject paid a just tribute to the late Senator Walsh of Montana. No tribute which he might give to the late Senator could exceed that which is justly due him.

Senator Walsh was not only a man of great industry and great ability and of moral probity but he possessed, in a most eminent degree, the rare virtue of intellectual integrity. He was an earnest advocate of international judicial tribunals, but he never was satisfied with the advisory jurisdiction of this Court. No one labored more intelligently and more industriously than did Senator Walsh to try to limit the jurisdiction of the Court so as both to protect the Court and to protect the interests of the United States. He was always vigilant and was never satisfied. When the Root protocol came back, Senator Walsh was one of the first to say that it was inadequate, that it did not sufficiently protect the interests of the United States; and again he set himself to work to surround and circumscribe and limit the jurisdiction of the Court in this respect as he thought would be in the interest and for the protection of the United States.

However, in the last public speech, so far as I know, which he made, he said in explaining the reservations, and so forth—

I enter upon no defense of that jurisdiction—

The advisory jurisdiction—exercised by this Court.

Being an earnest advocate of the Court, or of some court, and this Court at last, he felt that there could be sufficient reservation to justify our entrance into the Court; but I do not understand that Senator was ever satisfied with the advisory jurisdiction of the Court; that is to say, as an original proposition. I do not mean to say that he was not satisfied to enter the Court; of course he was, but he entertained always grave doubt about the wisdom of the advisory jurisdiction of the Court.

Mr. President, let us inquire for a moment just what is the advisory jurisdiction of the Court. It is a peculiar jurisdiction. If the United States and Great Britain were members of the Court and they desired the benefit of the advisory jurisdiction of the Court, they could not ask the Court for an advisory opinion.

No nation litigant could ask the Court for an advisory opinion. No one can set in motion and make active the advisory jurisdiction of the Court except a purely political body—the League of Nations. I do not care whether it is the League or some other political body, but bear in mind that this jurisdiction is subject, in the initiative, solely to the control of a political body. It alone can form the issue upon which it is to ask advice; it alone can put the issue up to the Court and ask for advice. In other words, the League may ask for advice or an opinion not upon some juridical question alone, not for the interpretation of a treaty alone, not upon some such question as we ordinarily consider when we are thinking of submitting a matter to a court; but observe the breadth of the jurisdiction of the Court. It applies to any dispute or question arising in international affairs. No dispute may arise in all the international affairs of Europe, but the League, if it sees fit, may ask the Court for an opinion; may ask it for its advice upon the subject. How can it be possible under these circumstances to keep the tribunal out of politics?

Of course, Mr. President, it has been said, and it is true, that all courts are at times charged with being influenced by political consideration; I doubt if there has ever been a court created that has not been affected at times, unconsciously, at least, by political considerations; but I invite attention to the fact that here is a jurisdiction which is controlled in its initiative by a political body, a jurisdiction which may embrace any question, whether political or otherwise, if the League sees fit to submit it.

Having briefly explained the Court's jurisdiction, I shall now illustrate, as best I may, the inevitable workings of that jurisdiction in the case of great questions which may arise.

In ordinary matters, where there would be involved no politics, no national feeling, no great passion or sentiment, it is possible that the political side of the question could be avoided, I take the position that I have from the beginning, that in important questions, the great problems which may arise, those which we would be most concerned to have the Court pass upon, politics and economics and national interests inevitably enter into the consideration in the disposition of questions which are disposed of as the advisory jurisdiction. I invite the attention of the Senate today carefully to this contention and to that point. I am going to take as an illustration one case, the one case in which politics were concerned, in which national feelings were aroused. That case, I think, will disclose unmistakably the influence of politics and of national interest upon the workings and opinions of this tribunal. Not only, Mr. President, may there be involved matters of direct concern to the United States, but if the United States were a member of the Court and assisting in the exercise of its advisory jurisdiction—that is one of the means by which the United States could be drawn into all political questions that may arise in Europe, and there would be no way to prevent it.

The able Senator from Arkansas was instrumental in having placed in the resolution of adherence to the protocols a statement designed to protect the United States, giving the United States the right to object to an advisory opinion where its interests were involved. I most heartily commend the able Senator for his watchfulness in that regard. But I invite you to consider today the character of questions which arise in Europe, the questions which we will be called upon to consider with reference to the affairs of Europe. The American policy is not that of protecting American interests on the western continent alone; the American policy consists equally in not intruding ourselves into the affairs of foreign governments in European affairs. It does not seem possible under the exercise of this jurisdiction for the United States to abstain from interfering with and having a part in determining the most intricate and the most vital political questions which may arise in Europe. When this Government adheres to the Court and joins in giving advice upon these European political and economic matters which may be brought before the Court, we become involved in European politics.

The most noted case in regard to this matter is that of the German-Austrian customs treaty, or the German-Austrian customs decision, we will say. In this case the Court was called upon to pass upon a question which was supposed to involve nothing more than the interpretation of a treaty. Senators, it is my belief that, if you will examine that record, you will inevitably come to the conclusion that the Court was used to accomplish a political goal and that a majority of the Court yielded to aroused national political passions. The able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] said that courts were generally fair. I agree with him; I am not today intimating that the Italian judge or the French judge or the Rumanian judge were corrupted in the sense that we use that term ordinarily. I only mean to say that when they were called upon to render advice or an opinion upon a matter in which their nations were supremely interested, upon which their nations had expressed themselves, upon which national feelings had been purposely aroused, they reflected the same sentiments as the respective nations had reflected through their political officers before the decision was rendered.

They were moved in giving advice, as every other Frenchman was moved, as every Polander was moved. Had they been called upon merely to determine a question of law it might have been different, but they were asked by a political body to offer advice—a mere opinion—upon a question involving a matter of supposed tremendous political and economic consequences, and the judges of those nations expressed the same views and adopted the same arguments as the respective premiers had expressed long before the Court acted. Was there no politics? Can credulity stand the strain?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am loath to interrupt the learned Senator from Idaho, but if he will indulge me for a brief statement, perhaps it may tend to clarify the issue between the Senator from Idaho and myself.

The statement has often been made that the Austro-German customs case is an illustration of the political character of the World Court and of its readiness to respond to political influences. The declaration has been made—and I understand that to be the statement of the Senator from Idaho, who is now addressing the Senate—that this case peculiarly shows that the World Court as it is constituted cannot determine an issue submitted in a request for an advisory opinion according to high judicial standards. I undertake now to say, after a somewhat careful study of that case, that the criticism which has been made against the World Court on account of the Austro-German customs case is not justified. The question submitted to the Court was a judicial question; it was not a political question. The manner in which it was dealt with by the Court does not justify the conclusion that the Court was controlled by mere political considerations, and subsequent events have proven beyond the cavil of a doubt that the advisory opinion rendered in the Austro-German case was just and wise and in conformity to the principles of international law.

With the permission of the Senator from Idaho, I meet the challenge which the enemies of the Court make in that particular with the counterstatement that an analysis of the record of the question submitted and the manner in which it was dealt with and disposed of by the Court justifies the result of the proceedings, according to the highest standards of judicial determination.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that makes the issue clear between the able Senator and myself. I am pleased to have it made clear. I repeat that in my opinion—and I am going into some detail and I am afraid of somewhat wearying the Senate in undertaking to demonstrate what I say—that the chancellories of Europe, the political leaders of Europe, invoked the aid of this Court to accomplish a political end; that they did so through the Court; that before the decision was ever handed down it was known what it would be, and being known what it would be they utilized it for the purpose of bludgeoning Germany and Austria into submission.

Mr. President, what was the question before the Court? There was just one question submitted to the Court. As the able Senator said, the question submitted was a legal question and should have been decided as a legal question, and there the Court should have stopped. What was the question? The question was whether a certain treaty entered into between Austria and Germany alienated or impaired the independence of Austria. That was the question. That on the face of it looks like and was a proper matter to be submitted to a court. Did the treaty alienate the independence of Austria? That treaty was made on the 19th day of March 1931. What were the terms of the treaty? Let me invite attention to them.

The treaty in question does not surrender any territory between the parties or surrender or abandon any governmental powers between the parties. It was a tariff treaty much in the nature of treaties which the able Secretary of State is negotiating or would negotiate if he could find someone to negotiate with on the question of tariffs at the present time. They had made a tariff treaty practically establishing free trade, at least a very low tariff, between Germany and Austria. That was in legal effect the sum total of the terms of the treaty. There was to be no separate customs service, no fusion of administration, and no common fund. An arbitral tribunal was set up to pass upon all controversies arising out of the administration of the treaty.

The plan was to be rejected or might be rejected at the end of 3 years by either party. The plan was open to adhesion by any other nation. The plan does not provide that the tariff laws of Germany be adopted by Austria or that the tariff laws of Austria be adopted by Germany. There is a unification of customs duties between the countries. Each country acted exclusively for itself in determining all questions with relation to the administration of the tariff and as to the kind of tariff within certain limits. The fact is the full purport of the treaty was the establishment of comparative free trade between these countries.

Mr. President, examine this treaty as you will, up and down and across, and it will be found that it in nowise surrendered any of the sovereignty of Austria, unless the making of any ordinary tariff treaty would be a surrender of the sovereignty of a country, which no one will contend.

Just as soon as this treaty was made, it burst like a storm, a political hurricane, over Europe. The politics of Europe were stirred to their depths. Even the great apostle of peace, Briand, declared publicly that they would use force to dissolve the treaty if necessary. The President of France in a public address—and this was before the Court passed upon the matter—declared that the League did not have military power or military force sufficient to enforce the abandonment of the treaty; therefore France must rely upon her own military force for that purpose.

The great Premier of Czechoslovakia declared in a pamphlet, which he wrote on the subject, that the legal question was of little significance, that the real question was a political and economic question, and he said, "It presents the most serious political question since the war." He declared that regardless of what the Court might decide, they would not be bound by or permit the treaty to stand.

This was the political situation as it arose immediately after the announcement of the treaty. It was in this atmosphere and in this political turmoil that it was concluded to call on the Court to ask for this opinion. Not Germany, not Austria, but a purely political body, the League, asked for an opinion as to the validity of this treaty.

May I read the exact question which was presented to the Court? This is the exact question which was presented to the Court:

> Would a regime established between Germany and Austria on the basis and within the limits of the principles laid down in the protocol of March 19, 1931—

Which I have been explaining—> the text of which is annexed to the present request, be compatible with article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain and with protocol no. 1. signed at Geneva on October 4, 1922?

With the Treaty of St. Germain, Senators are familiar. The protocol of 1922 was the agreement entered into between Austria and other nations when they made a loan to Austria, this protocol practically repeating what is called the "Treaty of St. Germain", and that is that Austria should not do anything to alienate her independence. The question was whether the treaty which had been made did alienate the independence of Austria.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. This is important.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it is.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to ask the Senator if the question on its face did not raise the issue as to whether the Austro-German customs protocol of March 1931 was compatible with article 22 of the Treaty of St. Germain and certain provisions in the Geneva protocol of 1922? It was not simply a question as to the effect on the independence of Austria of the arrangement proposed to be entered into with Germany, but whether in view of existing treaty obligations assumed by Austria or forced upon her, she had the right to enter into the Austro-German customs arrangement—whether, in view of her existing obligations, that constituted an infringement on her independence.

Mr. BORAH. That is practically correct. The question was whether the regime entered into on the 29th of March 1931 was incompatible with article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain and with protocol no. 1 signed at Geneva on October 4, 1922.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon further interruption—and I shall not interrupt him if it will interfere with the course of his argument—he has alluded forcefully to the fact that at the time this request for an advisory opinion was submitted to the Court there was a tense political feeling existing in Europe. Admittedly that is true, but that condition frequently, if not always, exists when serious controversies arise of an international character. There is no power with which I am familiar that can drive away the atmosphere of tensity and hostility, if you please, which inevitably arises during a crisis in the affairs of nations; no method to cause the world to be enveloped in calm, sunshine, and good will; so that as a practical proposition if we are to have any peaceful method of settling international disputes, we must recognize the necessity of dealing with the question at a time when tense political feeling exists.

In the plan for a world court which the Senator from Idaho himself proposed in 1923 it was contemplated that every international question arising under a code should be submitted to the World Court which he proposed, without any limit or restriction on the jurisdiction, with full power in the Court to decide every international question that might arise, whether the parties desired that it do so or opposed such jurisdiction.

Does the Senator from Idaho, with all his learning and experience in international affairs, concede that his plan for an international court would have enabled the Court to function without undergoing the difficulty and embarrassment which inevitably arises out of political considerations? These political considerations always reflect themselves in cases of acute dispute. They do it in our States. They do it in the United States.

There is no way with which I am familiar of divesting international questions of political considerations. So if we are to have a court, whether we give it the limited powers that are conferred on the Permanent Court of International Justice or give it the unlimited powers which were contemplated by the Borah resolution of 1923, we must, in recognition of practical conditions, realize that the court, if it functions at all, will function in the face of and in spite of intense political feeling.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I stated in the opening of my remarks that I had always been an advocate of an international judicial tribunal for the settlement of international disputes, and that my objection to this Court was based upon this advisory jurisdiction, which, in my judgment, not only permits but necessarily draws into the discussion and into the consideration political questions, for the reason that the jurisdiction is not limited as I would have it limited to questions arising under a code, or to questions of the construction of a treaty, or to judicial questions. Here it is any dispute, any question which a political body may submit—not which two litigants may take to the court which I would contemplate; not which Great Britain and the United States might see fit to submit to the Court, but which a purely political body may see fit to submit to the Court; and that jurisdiction is unlimited in the matter of the kind of dispute or the questions which may be submitted.

But, Mr. President, let me proceed with this matter further; and I think in doing so I shall have further reference to the remarks which the Senator from Arkansas has just made.

Let us get back and find out what this was. I have read what was the question submitted to the Court, and that was whether this treaty between Germany and Austria was in conflict with the St. Germain Treaty. Let me read it:

> The independence of Austria is inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations; consequently Austria undertakes, in the absence of the consent of the said Council, to abstain from any act which might, directly or indirectly or by any means whatever, compromise her independence, particularly, and until her admission to the membership of the League of Nations, by participation in the affairs of another power.

The Court agreed, both the majority and the minority, that the sole question submitted was whether this treaty of 1931 alienated the independence of Austria. There was no other question. What I object to is that after they settled the legal question they left the domain of legalism and went into politics, and they say so in the decision itself. Again let me read the protocol:

The Government of the Federal Republic of Austria undertakes, in accordance with the terms of article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain, not to alienate its independence; it will abstain from any negotiation or from any economic or financial engagements calculated, directly or indirectly, to compromise this independence. This undertaking shall not prevent Austria from maintaining, subject to the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain, her freedom in the matter of customs' tariffs and commercial or financial agreements and, in general, in all matters relating to her economic regime.

When that was put into that protocol Mr. Balfour said:

This makes it plain that Austria is not to be embarrassed in her customs matters, in her tariff matters, in her financial matters.

And that is all under heaven that the treaty of 1931 covered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator has omitted to read to the Senate the controlling part of the protocol. It follows immediately the language which the Senator read. With his permission I will read it all, so that the connection may be seen.

This undertaking shall not prevent Austria from maintaining, subject to the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain, her freedom in the matter of customs, tariff, and commercial or financial agreements, and, in general, in all matters relating to her economic regime or her commercial relations, provided always that she shall not violate her economic independence by granting to any state a special regime or exclusive advantage calculated to threaten this independence.

If I may take just one moment, the latter part of that is the material portion of it, insofar as the decision under discussion is concerned. It is certainly true, as I shall undertake to demonstrate later without infringing on the time of the Senator from Idaho, that the Austro-German customs union constituted a regime by which Germany and Austria sought to secure to each other great commercial and financial advantages in violation of the terms of article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain and of the Geneva protocol of 1922.

Again I thank the Senator, and I shall refrain from interrupting him further.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not read the concluding sentence because I had already read the same thing in the beginning, because all these matters were of no moment whatever unless they impaired or threatened the independence of Austria; and it all comes back to that proposition. They had a right to make tariff treaties and customs treaties unless the effect of them was to impair, alienate, or threaten the independence of Austria. I had made that plain.

Let us not have any mistake about this matter. The Court agreed that the question was whether the independence of Austria had been alienated or threatened. All other matters point to that one proposition, or they are of no moment.

Having placed the question before the Senate, before I take up the opinions, let me call attention to a matter which I cannot overlook.

On that Court at that time sat a French judge. The French Government had demanded publicly that these two nations abrogate this treaty. The President and the Premier of France had said that, if necessary, they would use force.

Poland had a judge on the Court. The feeling in Poland was in excess of that in any other country that I know of.

Rumania had a judge on the Court.

Italy had a judge on the Court.

Spain had a judge on the Court.

Now, after the decision in the Mosul case, Turkey greatly complained because a matter was decided by those who were sitting in opposition to her interests; and therefore the Court proceeded to make a rule that where a government had a special interest they might have a judge ad hoc; they might select a judge to sit in the case.

What happened? Spain, France, Poland, Rumania, Italy, and all these nations who had declared in unmistakable terms that this treaty had to be abrogated, either peacefully or by force, were represented on the Court. Austria came in and asked permission to have a judge ad hoc. Can we conceive of its being denied? Austria was virtually on trial for her life; that is, there was involved the right to make a treaty, one of the high attributes of sovereign power—and the judges were about to decide that she did not have the right to make a tariff treaty which probably was necessary for her continued existence. She asked that a judge ad hoc from Austria be permitted to sit with the judges of France and Poland and Rumania and the other governments which were equally interested in the matter. Can we say that Austria had not the same right to have a representative there that France or Rumania or Poland had? Did she have a less right? Certainly not. Upon what principle of justice, under what rule of common decency, was Austria denied a judge?

Mr. President, I contend that these things are the exhibition of national feeling. Nobody went to the Italian judge and bought him; nobody went to the French judge and corrupted him; but the national interest, the national feeling obtaining throughout the country, would and did consciously—or, if not consciously, unconsciously—affect them.

Austria asked for a judge to sit in the case, and that right was denied to Austria. I cannot see anything in that except an act of great injustice; and that act of injustice that could not occur except by reason of the strongest kind of national feeling, which national feeling obscured and beclouded the Court's sense of justice.

So we go into the Court. France sends her attorneys to argue the case. Italy sends her attorneys to argue the case, and so forth. Let us now examine the majority opinion.

I contend that upon the majority opinion the legal question was decided in favor of Austria. I contend, furthermore, that the legal opinion was a unanimous decision; that the 15 judges agreed upon the legal question. I read a paragraph from the majority opinion:

It can scarcely be denied that the establishment of this regime does not in itself constitute an act alienating Austria's independence, for Austria does not thereby cease within her own frontiers to be a separate state, with its own government and administration; and in view, if not of reciprocity of law, though perhaps not in fact, implied by the projected treaty, at all events of the possibility of denouncing the treaty, it may be said that legally Austria retains the possibility of exercising her independence.

That was the majority opinion. It cannot be said, according to the terms of the treaty, that Austria has alienated her independence. Was not that the question submitted to the Court?

The Court further says:

It may even be maintained, if regard be had to the terms of article 88 of the treaty of peace, that since Austria's independence is not, strictly speaking, in danger within the meaning of that article, there would not be from the point of view of law any inconsistency with that article.

Well, what else was there to decide? The judge had finished his task, the Court as a court had functioned, and the case was in favor of Austria. Then the nationalist takes hold and decides against Austria.

It may be even maintained, if regard be had to the terms of article 88, * * * that since Austria's independence is not, strictly speaking, in danger—within the meaning of that article, there would not be, from the point of view of law, any inconsistency.

Not in danger—

Here I desire to call attention to an opinion of this Court at a time when there was no politics, when passion was not prevailing throughout these countries.

They had another opinion, written some years before, in which a treaty had been made, and that opinion is found in Judgment No. 1, series A B 5, page 25. In that case they say:

> The Court declines to see in the conclusion of any treaty by which the state undertakes to perform, or refrain from performing a particular act, an abandonment of its sovereignty. No doubt any convention creating an obligation of this kind places a restriction upon the exercise of sovereign rights of the state in the sense that it requires them to be exercised in a certain way. But the right of entering into an international engagement is an attribute of state sovereignty.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that upon the principle of it all, and upon the language of the Court itself in the majority opinion, we must conclude that the legal question was settled in favor of Austria.

I read this paragraph because it is the one which has been relied upon by the opposition:

> On the other hand, it is difficult to deny that the projected regime of customs union constitutes a special regime and that it affords Germany, in relation to Austria, advantages which are withheld from third powers.

That is the result of any tariff treaty, or may be, unless you have the most-favored-nation clause, which prevents any such thing. The fact that we might have a reciprocity treaty with Canada which would give Canada a special advantage or a special favor, is that an alienation of our independence, or has it anything in the world to do with the alienation of our independence? It may be that Austria desired to give Germany a special favor with a treaty as we might desire to give as much to Canada. But what has this Court to do with the question of a special favor to somebody if it did not alienate the independence of Austria? This sophistry, if I may use the term, was worked after the legal question was decided and when it became necessary to bolster up a political opinion.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the opinion go so far and does the Senator believe that under that opinion the Court would have the right to pass upon questions of public policy?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. If they find no objection from the legal standpoint, have they the power to go into the problem of public policy?

Mr. BORAH. That is what they did in effect in this matter. They said that it was against the policy of Europe to have Austria and Germany come in close relationship to one another. That is the effect of the decision. I will read a line or two in a minute which will show that.

Now, Senators, let us come to the concurring opinion by the Italian judge. He is evidently an able lawyer and is very frank. He said:

> Everything * * * depends on considerations which are for the most part, if not entirely, of a political and economic kind.

He took the position that the Court might, by reason of the fact that it was political, refuse to pass upon it at all, but if they were going to pass on it they necessarily had to pass upon the political question. So he did proceed to pass upon the political question in his concurring opinion.

Senators, listen to this paragraph from the concurrent opinion:

> We are definitely concerned with a particular instance, and, I must say, an instance which derives its importance from the fact that we are dealing with the relations between Germany and Austria.

Would the law be changed by reason of the fact that you were dealing with a question between Germany and Austria? Would the independence of Austria depend upon the proposition that you were dealing with Germany instead of some other country? Yes; that is what they held.

> It is quite probable that a similar customs union, or even a closer union between Czechoslovakia (and Germany), would not have raised the slightest difficulty.

Mr. GORE. Does the Court say that?

Mr. BORAH. That is in the concurring opinion of one of the majority of eight.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, for the simple reason that Czechoslovakia was not under the restraint imposed by article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain and by the Geneva protocol of 1932.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; that is not the reasoning of the judge at all. The reasoning of the judge is that he is dealing with a special instance, and that instance is between Germany and Austria. If it were between Germany and some other country, and the same principle applied with reference to treaty, it would not present any difficulty whatever. That is shown by the opinion which I read a few minutes ago from another decision in which they said the making of that kind of a treaty in no sense impaired the sovereignty of a nation. That was the only question which was before them. It was not Austria's right to enter into a customs union in general. In my view, that right is unquestioned. Everything points to the fact that the answer depends upon the considerations which are for the most part, if not entirely, political.

The conclusion at which I have arrived, after much careful reflection, is that the Court must either refuse to give this opinion asked for or give it upon the question as a whole—politics and all.

It may be a coincidence, but a coincidence worth mentioning, that the judge from every nation which had declared against the treaty decided against the treaty, and the judge of every nation which was neutral decided in the minority. I think that a significant fact. It shows an unconsciously national influence. Yes; unconscious—not necessary to go further.

Mr. ROBINSON. I did not hear the Senator's last statement.

Mr. BORAH. I say it shows that unconscious national influence.

Mr. ROBINSON. What does?

Mr. BORAH. The fact that every judge whose nation had declared against the treaty found that the treaty was void, and the other nations which were not interested found that the treaty was valid.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator apply that to the British judge?

Mr. BORAH. The British judge decided for the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. He decided with the minority.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Great Britain had not declared against the treaty at all. The Government had taken no action whatever upon the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON. Had Belgium taken no action?

Mr. BORAH. No; it had taken no action whatever that I know of.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Belgian judge, who could not be charged with having any German sympathy or Austrian sympathy, stood with the minority.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; the Belgian judge did.

Mr. ROBINSON. And so did the British.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Those nations had taken no pronounced position upon the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON. But their political alinements and alliances and sympathies were supposed to be against the decision.

Mr. BORAH. Not Great Britain. That might be true of Belgium, but not Great Britain. Great Britain was not opposed to the treaty.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator think that the political sentiment in Great Britain supported the Austro-German customs union?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about it. The press almost universally supported it. One of the most powerful editorials I think I ever read——

Mr. ROBINSON. I am speaking of the Government policy.

Mr. BORAH. I know, but the Government never took any action against it. The Government never made any declaration against it that I have been able to find. The press almost universally supported it. In an editorial by Mr. Garvin, the editor of the London Observer, recognized as one of the great editorial writers in the world, he made an extensive defense of this treaty; and so far as I have been able to find in the English press, there was never any criticism of it. At least there was no manifestation of feeling in the country. There was no sentiment against it. And so far as the officials were concerned, I never found any expression.

Let us now take the minority opinion. The opening paragraph says:

The Council [of the League]—

I insert the words "of the League" because it was the Council of the League—

The Council has asked for the opinion of the Court on a legal question. * * * This Court is not concerned with political consideration nor with political consequences. These lie outside its competence.

There was a clear statement upon the part of the minority that they agreed with the majority on the legal question—on that end of the case. In other words, on the legal question the Court was unanimous.

We are not concerned with politics, said the minority. We are not concerned with economics. We are only concerned with the question of whether a treaty alienates the independence of a nation. You, the majority, have decided that it does not. We agree with you. That ends the question. We have nothing to do with anything else.

It was upon the political question that the minority and the majority split. There is no difference of opinion here between the majority and the minority on the legal question involved. The 15 judges agreed upon the legal question that it did not alienate the independence of Austria. Then the minority said in effect, "We cannot follow you in the discussion of the political consequences or the economic consequences."

Again the minority opinion says:

The decision of the Court must necessarily be based upon material submitted for its consideration. Unless the material submitted to it and passed upon by the Court justifies the conclusions reached, these conclusions cannot amount to more than mere speculation.

It is not enough that the arrangement should be the grant of a special regime—

Of which the able Senator from Arkansas speaks—or of exclusive advantages—

Says the minority—

the grant must be calculated to threaten Austria's independence. The Court has no evidence before it on which such a conclusion can be reached.

So, Mr. President, the minority opinion says, "We agree with you on the legal question, the special regime. The economic effect or political consequences are matters with which we have nothing to do."

Which is the conclusive presumption raised that they thought the majority were dealing with political questions.

There is a rather lengthy minority opinion, which I think it is not necessary to read.

Mr. President, I have had a very careful research made of the press of Europe upon the effect of this decision. Outside of England, out of some 30 or 40 papers—to be exact I think 34; the leading papers—I have my first paper to find which did not declare that it was a political decision. The great majority of them say that was as it was expected to be and should be. In other words, they expect a political decision from the Court when the necessity arises.

I may say in passing that that is due largely to a wholly different conception of the functions of a court between the Europeans and the people of the United States. The Europeans are not disturbed over the fact that it was a political opinion. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] referred to the fact that the representatives on the bench from Belgium decided the other way. The papers I referred to, or some of them, denounced him, saying that he went off on a legal question and refused to consider the bigger question—the political and economic question. One leading paper in Europe said in almost so many words that the Belgium judge deserted us and undertook to decide the question upon legal grounds and not upon political grounds.

Mr. President, that is an illustration of the nature of the Court as it is used by those who undertake to call into action its advisory powers.

A singular thing happened. A few days before this opinion was announced officially it was given out that the opinion would be against Germany and Austria, and it is a historic fact that that pronouncement led to activity upon the part of certain chancellories of Europe to bring Austria and Germany into an agreement to abandon the treaty. Before the opinion was ever officially announced they were in negotiation, in view of the coming opinion, which they seemed to know of, and brought Germany and Austria into an agreement to abandon it before the Court announced its opinion. Someone was in touch with the Court. The Court was lending itself to a political move. The opinion, which had not been announced, was announced, apparently, to the prime ministers, and they used it to whip Germany and Austria into submission. What a spectacle!

Mr. President, I think the New York Tribune, commenting upon this matter at the time, states the subject briefly, but comprehensively, when it says:

The Court has suffered a severe loss of prestige. Its members are just so much further from achieving the habit of a judicial approach to international problems. And as long as the advisory opinion remains in the Court statute, the same demoralizing influence can recur again and again.

Does not that necessarily follow? An important question arises in Europe; it is political in its nature; a political body of the League of Nations asks for an opinion; passion is stirred up in the respective countries. It is natural that the judges of the Court should give way, consciously or unconsciously to that feeling; and they did in this instance, in my judgment, and were influenced by it to render an opinion based purely upon national feeling and political interest.

The moral seems to us clear—

Says the Tribune—

the advisory opinion can scarcely ever be of real help to the League, as the current decision shows. It can, and will, plague the Court as long as it endures. If it were eliminated, the adherence of this country would be a far simpler matter. Why do not the real friends of the Court work for the elimination of the advisory opinion entire?

That, Mr. President, states briefly the view which I entertain with reference to this matter. I would have no objection to an international tribunal to which parties themselves—speaking now of parties as meaning nations and governments—might voluntarily submit questions for an international adjudication. If a question should arise affecting Great Britain and the United States and they wanted to submit it to a court, of course there ought to be a court to hear it; but should there be a court which could draw us into the case, whether we wanted an opinion or not, through the political operation of the League, the League itself having full power to insist upon an opinion whether Great Britain and the United States should desire an opinion or not? That of itself makes it a political movement and gives it a political significance, controlling the jurisdiction by a political power; and it will always have the same effect as it had in the German-Austrian case.

The New York Times, an ardent supporter of the Court, says:

That the 8-to-7 decision against the Austro-German tariff union was dictated by national sentiment is obvious. Yes; obvious. Well stated. It has never been denied except by certain parties in this country.

* * * * * * *

The reason—

Says the Times—

for Italy's action is well understood. She does not want Anschluss any more than France does, because she does not want a united Germanic state of nearly 80,000,000 people for a frontier neighbor. Here is a common interest with France which the event has shown to transcend rivalry with France in the Mediterranean or jealousy of French supremacy on the Continent.

Let me read an editorial from the Bund, which is one of the leading newspapers of Switzerland, bearing on this matter. The Bund says:

The authority of the world justice has not gained anything. The Hague Court ought to reserve its activity and verdicts for real contests between two countries about the interpretation of international law. What is the use of investing an arropage of judges with the highest international honors if it is to be exposed at the occasion of a trifling matter to run the risk of giving a political rather than a juridical verdict, like the sentence of September 5, 1931, in which The Hague Court declares the Austro-German custom union incompatible with the Treaty of St. Germain. All the rejecting judges of the World Court hail from Latin countries, Italy, Spain, San Salvador, Colombia, Cuba, Rumania, France, and its satellite, Poland, while the seven judges in favor of the Austro-German custom union belong to Teutonic races, Hurst, England; Schucking, Germany; Van Eysinga, Holland; and even Rolin Jacquemyns, Belgian, abandoning his French ally; Kellogg, United States of America, united to the far-eastern Japanese, Adatci; and Wang, China.

* * * * * * *

How far we are from Wilson's claim for open-door politics. The Hague verdict has been cast forehand behind closed doors long before it was officially made public. "A Just Peace" was the slogan under which the allied nations fought the World War to its bitter end. Cannot the World Court, established by the world peace, in future be protected from such blunders as this custom-union verdict? May Switzerland raise its voice in Geneva in favor of true world justice.

And may Switzerland rejoice that at present she is not a member of the World Court?

There are other articles, Mr. President, which I shall undertake to insert later.

Mr. President, the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] in his remarks on Friday last declared that he would not go 1 inch toward the League; that he was utterly opposed to approaching the League. I know that this represents his view. But let me ask the Senator from Michigan if we are to be a member of this tribunal which tribunal the League may call into action, if we are a member of a tribunal which the League may call upon us as a member of the Court for advice, and we, as a member of the Court, join in advice to the League, just how close to the League are we? If the League dominates our action, what is our relation to the League?

Here is a tribunal of which we are a member, a tribunal having advisory jurisdiction, upon which the League may call, when it chooses, for an opinion. Where does this power of advisory jurisdiction come from? Does it come from the statute of the Court? Certainly not.

It comes from the League of Nations. There could be no advisory opinion if it were not in the League of Nations covenant; there could be no advisory opinion if the League did not call for it; and when we respond to the question of the League, I ask again just how close are we to the League?

Again, Mr. President, let us suppose that when the German-Austrian Treaty came before it we were a member of the Court; suppose that we had become a member in 1926, what would have been the situation? Here was a tribunal of which we were a member which was dealing with a question which was purely European in character, which did not concern us in the slightest, which was purely European in its import and in its effect; we would not have entered into a discussion of the matter of our own voluntary action; but as a member of the Court, a member of the tribunal, the League calls upon us for an advisory opinion, and we join with the other members of the Court in passing upon a purely political European question. If we would not be acting under the auspices, under the direction, and under the influence of the League, I do not know what would bring us under the influence of the League.

O Mr. President, you will never hear anything more about the World Court not being a part of the League after we are in it. The situation will be like that depicted by Earl Grey, who came over here when we were discussing reservations to the League of Nations. He went home and wrote a letter to the London Times, saying, "Let them come in with their reservations; we will construe their reservations."

If we go into the Court and the League calls for an opinion and we join in an opinion, we take part in the controversy; we decide upon questions that are purely European. We are dealing with European problems.

Mr. President, it has been supposed that by putting in a provision that the Court shall not render an opinion touching the interests of the United States over our objection, we have protected the interests of the United States. Does that prevent us from being drawn into European controversies, a prospect which, to my mind, is infinitely worse than European nations coming into American controversies.

Reservation 5 does not protect us from being drawn into European affairs; it only saves us, as they contend, from their passing upon matters which are of vital concern to us on the Western Continent. But, in view of the decision in the German-Austrian question, if Mussolini should consent to have the Court take jurisdiction of the Abyssinian question—he has not consented as yet and says he will not do so—but if he should consent to have the Court take jurisdiction, and we should become a member of the Court, we would be called upon to pass upon another question which has been threatening the peace of Europe for the last 30 days.

There is no way, Mr. President, that can be found by which to keep out of European controversies if we go into the Court and if its advisory jurisdiction remains. What is the advisory jurisdiction? It is counsel; it is advice; and we are counseling, we are advising, with reference to European affairs every time questions concerning them arise. Take out the advisory jurisdiction and make it a court and I should not detain the Senate a minute in opposition.

Mr. President, as I have said, this has been a long controversy. I know that I have been fearfully misjudged, because it has been supposed that I am not in favor of an international judicial tribunal. I am not in favor of an international judicial tribunal, so called, which is political and advisory in character. I am not going to give my vote in favor of a tribunal through which we can be drawn into every dispute, every controversy, every question which may arise in the caldron of European politics. I cannot be deceived by calling it a court. You had just as well call the Council of the League a court. The Council of the League, operating through the Court, can draw us into every dispute which we could be drawn into if we were a member of the Council.

This tribunal was created by the League, its members are elected by the League, paid by the League, and pensioned by the League. It is a tribunal designed in the first instance to be and actually has been created as a department of the League. It is now and for all time an adviser and counselor of the League—an inseparable, vital part of the machinery of the League. It is a tribunal dependent for its continued existence upon the continued existence of the League. When the League falls this tribunal falls. The Covenant of the League is a constitution which this tribunal must observe and is to expound. Is it fair to say to the American people that in becoming a member of this most important department of the League we are not in the League and a part of the League—a part of the machinery of the entire organization? If we desire to maintain the Court of this tribunal after we have joined it, must we not maintain the League in order to maintain the Court? Can we become interested in maintaining a department of the League and not be interested in the League as a whole?

Mr. President, the great achievement in government may be said to be the impartial administration of justice. Property rights and personal liberty alike wait upon the success of this achievement. Contentment among the people, the progress and prosperity of a people are advanced and assured in proportion to the progress made in the full realization of this achievement.

The history of jurisprudence discloses that the highest aims and the best thought in public affairs have been associated with the effort to establish and maintain tribunals fearless and unembarrassed in the administration of the law. And just in proportion and to the extent that courts have been divorced from the demoralizing influence of politics, they have commanded the respect and retained the confidence of the people—their judgments have been accepted without complaint and their decrees obeyed without resentment. Show me the record of the courts of any country and I will measure from that record with complete accuracy and fidelity the loyalty of the people to the institutions under which they live. In the English-speaking world—not to go elsewhere for an example—the fiercest struggles for liberty have been animated and sustained in the high resolve to remove the courts from the atmosphere and from the control of political forces.

It is my conviction, entertained from the hour this Court was set up, that in its advisory jurisdiction we are taking a long step, a dangerous step, backward in the long struggle to relieve courts from political influence. We are so constructing a court that not only may politics enter but it is practically inevitable that politics must enter into the considerations of the Court. A political body controls and makes active this jurisdiction of the Court. It selects the issue, and it alone calls upon the Court to act. A political body, and a political body alone, may invoke this jurisdiction—and that political body is not confined to juridical questions. It may place before the Court "any dispute." There is not a political question or controversy arising in all Europe, but the Council or Assembly may pass up for the consideration of this Court, and the Court in yielding the request and in the exercise of its advisory jurisdiction is constrained and restrained by no body of laws, no constitution.

It may take into consideration political and economic questions, and base its opinion, not necessarily upon law but upon what it deems to be the best for those concerned, national interests, political and economic interests concerned. And let us remember that the politics which may be imposed upon this Court and which the Court may choose to consider are not the politics arising within a nation and among a people living under one government, but international politics—politics surcharged with a feeling and a passion of international distrust, national fear, national pride—the fiercest and most arrogant politics in all man's experience, all of which was completely revealed by the Court in the Austrian case.

I well understand the answer to my contention, and that is we must take the tribunal offered, inadequate and unsatisfactory though it may be, and hope to improve it in the future. Sir, if in building institutions you lay the foundations upon sound principles you may well be justified in relying upon the future to round out and complete the details and adjust and apply the machinery.

But you must in great enterprises begin with sound principles; your foundation must be upon a rock and not upon shifting sands. To start with wrong principles is to court disaster and ruin. There is nothing more demoralizing, more calculated to turn back the hopes and purposes of a people than the break-down of institutions upon which they have been led to rest their faith for better things. What would have happened had the fathers in 1789, instead of laying the foundation of this Government in sound and enduring principles, patched up the confederacy as some would have done? What would have happened to law and order had they enmeshed our Supreme Court in politics and imposed upon it nonjudicial duties? Faith in free government in a few years might have broken down utterly, our continent might have been cursed with many governments—Balkanized—and our whole western continent dedicated to lassitude and contention and turmoil, instead of one unbroken Union, a proud and united Republic dominating a continent and sheltering beneath its stately arches 120,000,000 people imbued with a common pride and inspired with a common purpose. I recall to you the words of the wisest of men in answer to those who would have compromised with sound principles:

> If to please the people we present what we ourselves disapprove, how can we thereafter defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and noble can repair; the event is in the hands of God.

The lesson of a thousand years of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence is that courts must be free from political influence and exempt from all duties not compatible with judicial power. We are instructed by experience and admonished by our clearest conception to demand such a court. In doing so we do not retard the cause of peace. We advance it, we do our plain, unmistakable duty in one of the most solemn tasks ever imposed upon men.

[From La Gazette, Brussels, Belgium]

Those involved in this matter would be wrong to pretend that the Hague Court had to give only a legal opinion. This argument would be without value if it had not still more strengthened the Austro-German thesis. For it is impossible not to know or to deny that the tariff union is a political problem. The Pan-European Commission and the Council of the League of Nations have proved that sufficiently when they resorted to the Hague Court. This evasion deceived no one. The economic aspect of the question was more important than the legal one, and far less important than the political aspect. The international judges have taken a back door out of the problem. * * * One understands now why the Council thanked the Hague Court, which tried to spare the feelings of both parties by pronouncing a colorless, odorless, shapeless verdict. * * *

[From Algemeen Handelsblad, Amsterdam, Holland]

The evidence, as far as it exists, upon which the verdict of the Hague Court on the Austro-German Customs Union is based, shows only too clearly that in the formation of the jury of judges politics played too great a role.

[From Neue Zuhoerer Zeitung, Zurich, Switzerland]

The grouping of the Court, as well as various divergences in the motives, let the Court's opinion appear to be rather torn, but it irrefutably follows from it that the barely sufficient majority of the Court allowed itself to a large extent to be guided by political motives.

[From Baseler Nachrichten, Basel, Switzerland]

We cannot wholly suppress our great surprise over the piteous meagerness with which the majority of judges of the Hague Court believed themselves justified in agreeing. The decisive sentences of the verdict are stutters and mumbles, but no arguments. We do not believe that even the smallest Swiss county court of the backwoods would dare to issue a verdict.

[From L'Excelsior, Switzerland]

One thing is certain: The judgment of the Court of The Hague on the Anschluss is not of a nature to encourage any governments in the future to submit their problems of vital interest to its arbitration.

[From Hamburger Fremdenblatt, Hamburg, Germany]

Today's example is the best proof for the necessity of changing the statutes of the Court in the interest of its reputation. It would be better if the judges belonged to countries who are not parties in the issue at stake, no matter what it is.

Otherwise the reputation of the Hague Court, upon which rests its usefulness in international quarrels, will very soon be wrecked. The first stop in this direction has unfortunately already been made.

[From Breslauer Neueste Nachrichten, Breslau, Germany]

Even though the verdict was clothed in a mantel of international law and economics, it was, after all, nothing more than a decision of superior power by the victor which turned out to the disadvantage of the vanquished, politically weaker party.

[From Le Journal des Debats]

The authority of the Court of The Hague will not be strengthened by this adventure. In order to obtain 8 votes in favor of the opinion which carried the day, all manner of negotiations and combinations were necessary. The majesty of international justice did not manifest itself in all its purity. It would have been better, no doubt, for the Court to have declared itself incompetent. One of the effects of the error committed this spring has made itself felt: The great international institutions upon which one was counting to assure peace are not in a happy phase of their existence.

Never has Europe more eagerly observed, studied, discussed America; and never has America followed more carefully, discussed more closely, the discussions of Europe about the United States. At the same time, it is hardly excessive to state that never have the two continents been wider apart in their inspirations and ideals. * * * The objections which the cultivated European instinctively raises to the American system come mainly from this fact: That the American point of view is at bottom democratic and the traditional European one aristocratic.

ANDRE SIEGFRIED.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand there is no one else ready to proceed now with further debate. Therefore I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of business on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first order of business on the calendar.

JAMES A. MOFFETT

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the action of the Senate in confirming the nomination of Mr. James A. Moffett to be Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Josephine A. Roche, of Colorado, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to have this nomination passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri why he requests the nomination of Miss Roche to be passed over?

Mr. CLARK. I desire to have opportunity to make further investigation.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Philemon C. Merrill to be collector of internal revenue, district of Arizona.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph T. Higgins to be collector of internal revenue, third district of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James L. O'Toole, Jr., to be collector of internal revenue, twenty-third district of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Fred C. Martin to be collector of internal revenue, district of Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harry M. Brennan to be collector, customs collection district no. 42, Louisville, Ky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

UNITED STATES ASSAY OFFICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph S. Buford to be assayer, United States Assay Office at New York, N. Y.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Sigmund Solomon to be Superintendent United States Assay Office, at New York, N. Y.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The legislative clerk read the nomination of John Willington Finch, of Idaho, to be Director of the Bureau of Mines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Public Health Service.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that nominations in the Public Health Service be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. That completes the Executive Calendar.

THE WORLD COURT

The Senate resumed consideration of Executive A (71st Cong., 3d sess.), protocols concerning adherence of the United States to the Permanent Court of International Justice, the pending question being the amendment of Mr. VANDENBERG to the resolution of adherence as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, before moving a recess I wish to take note of some of the things mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in connection with the Austro-German customs union case.

The World Court has rendered, as I now recall, something like 60 opinions. So far as the debate discloses and so far as my memory goes, the only instance in which its impartiality has been challenged is in the Austro-German customs case. There is a tendency on the part of litigants always to condemn the Court when their contentions are not sustained.

The Senator from Idaho is perhaps the ablest advocate within the Senate of any cause which he espouses, and he may be relied upon by the opponents of the Court to present his views with a full measure of thoughtfulness, force, and clarity. I do not believe, as I have stated during an interruption in the course of his remarks, that the one opinion of the World Court which has been criticized, the Austro-German customs case, fairly understood and analyzed, may be regarded as a political opinion or as a demonstration of a response of the Court to those sentiments of nationality which influence every intelligent human being.

The Senator correctly and accurately, of course, stated the question which was submitted to the Court. Aside from any argument which may be embraced in the opinion or in the conclusions which may be expressed by news writers or the editors of magazines and newspapers, it is my belief that when the treaty provisions which were germane to a proper determination of the issue in the customs case are fully understood, they will show conclusively that the special regime which Germany and Austria sought to establish by the protocol of March 1931 did impair the independence of Austria.

Let me assert now, lest I forget it, that I think history subsequent to the decision shows conclusively that if the customs union contemplated by the protocol of March 1931 had gone into effect, the union between Austria and Germany would have been accomplished, with the inevitable result that both the economic and the political independence of Austria would have been interfered with, almost destroyed.

The question was whether, in view of the existing obligations of Austria and Germany, the special arrangement which they sought to establish by the protocol of 1931 impaired the independence of Austria. In order to determine this question it will be helpful to look into the several pertinent treaty provisions, bearing in mind that the issue was not whether the treaty provisions were to be approved, but whether they were consistent.

In article 80 of the Treaty of Versailles, Germany acknowledged and bound herself to respect the independence of Austria within the boundaries to be fixed by the treaty.

Article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain recognized the independence of Austria as inalienable. Austria undertook to abstain from every action which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence.

Note the comprehensive nature of the undertaking. The Geneva protocol of 1922, signed at the time of the reconstruction loans by France, Great Britain, Italy, and Czechoslovakia to Austria, bound the four creditor powers and also Spain and Belgium to respect the political independence, the territorial integrity, and sovereignty of Austria, and not to seek to obtain any special or exclusive economic or financial advantage calculated directly or indirectly to compromise that independence.

In the same instrument, the Geneva protocol of 1922, Austria engaged—

> In accordance with article 88 of the Treaty of St. Germain, not to alienate its independence; to abstain from any negotiations or from any economic or financial engagements calculated directly or indirectly to compromise this independence.

It was further provided:

> This undertaking shall not prevent Austria from maintaining, subject to the provisions of the Treaty of St. Germain, her freedom in the matter of customs, tariff, and commercial, or financial agreements, and, in general, in all matters relating to her economic regime or her commercial relations, provided always that she shall not violate her economic independence by granting to any state a special regime or exclusive advantage calculated to threaten this independence.

Now the question arises whether the special arrangement under discussion was calculated to impair the independence of Austria.

The customs union provided for in the Austro-German protocol of March 1931 abolished all import and export duties between the two countries, and at the same time maintained export and import duties against countries not included in similar arrangements.

It was also contemplated that the two States—Austria and Germany—should act concurrently and that no amendments could be made to the tariff laws of either without the consent of the other.

I ask Senators if such an arrangement as that, in view of the obligations of Austria, was not calculated to impair her independence? Internal-revenue duties and other taxes, together with the rates imposed and the time of their duration, as well as the exchange of goods covered by monopolies, or excise duties in either country, were not to be subject to the independent action of the countries, but to joint agreement. The duties collected in the joint area were not to belong to the state collecting them, but were to be apportioned on an agreed basis.

Paraphrasing the language of an eminent authority, it is accurate to say that neither country is to have its own policy, but both are to have a joint policy, and a joint policy alone. In view of the great disproportion in the economic and political strength of Germany and Austria, it must be regarded as reasonably probable that Austria's economic life would sooner or later become dependent upon Germany's.

As stated by the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], for some reason Germany and Austria denounced the customs union of March 1931, and the decision was actually rendered after the occasion for it had passed; but those who are familiar with history will realize that running all the way through the German policy, both economic and political, is the purpose to compel a union with Austria, and the inevitable effect of it would be German domination of Austria.

I do not need to review the events of history which are familiar to all; how, as a result of an organization in South Germany, a movement for the forced union of Austria with Germany gathered volume until it became almost irresistible; and but for the intervention of Italy, and perhaps of other powers, the union would have been accomplished in spite of everything that Austria could do. And if the Anschluss had become an accomplished fact, if the union had been effected, who is there here who will assert, or even intimate, that the independence of Austria would have been preserved?

The inevitable result—indeed, the purpose—of the customs union was to bring about such a special arrangement between Germany and Austria that each could enjoy exclusively the benefits of trade with the other. That arrangement was in violation of the spirit of the Treaty of St. Germain, of the Geneva protocol of 1922, and certainly of the Versailles Treaty, although that may not be held to be involved.

In the light of history, in consideration of the fact that in 1932 Germany and Austria entered into a new protocol accepting the Court's decision, who is here who will say that it would have been better to abide the political consequences which the Senator from Idaho said were imminent? Who is here who will say that it would have been better to have let loose the dogs of war, as he said would have occurred if this Court decision had not been made, than to have had the decision of the Court?

Oh, yes; it is true, as the Senator from Idaho has stated, that feeling and sentiment in Europe was tense, that national feeling was powerful; but, Mr. President, as I remarked during the speech of the Senator from Idaho, the time is not at hand when we can hope to escape from the atmosphere which naturally envelops a situation. By such a world court as the Senator from Idaho proposes—a court empowered to try and decide all international questions—we are not going to remove from the hearts and minds of men those feelings which he designated as "national feelings." Throughout our progress we shall be compelled to make our adjustments and effectuate our arrangements in the face of and in spite of influences which are not always calculated to promote harmony and impartiality; but the important thing is that we shall not confess ourselves powerless, here and everywhere, now and at all times, to do anything that may be helpful in composing those differences which are likely to result in conflict.

Mr. President, unless there is some further business to come before the Senate, I shall move a recess.

PRINTING OF ARTICLES ON RUSSIA

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SCHALL. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain articles on Russia.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is a matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate in connection with leave to print heretofore extended to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

The Senator, on a recent day of this session, had printed in the RECORD, by unanimous consent, a statement from one of his constituents bitterly assailing Members of this body and bitterly assailing the President of the United States. I am, therefore, compelled to object to the request of the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SCHALL. Does the Senator prefer that this matter be read?

Mr. ROBINSON. If it is of the character of the articles which the Senator has been inserting in the RECORD, I shall object to its being read. I have no means of knowing what the Senator desires to have printed. I will say to the Senator frankly that I think he has abused his privileges.

Mr. MCNARY rose.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] states that there is nothing in the article unfairly reflecting on the President or Members of this body, I shall make no objection.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber. Is there a request to read the article proposed by the Senator from Minnesota? What is the nature of the request?

Mr. SCHALL. I desired to have certain matter printed in the RECORD, and the Senator from Arkansas objected.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I may make a statement, the Senator from Minnesota asked unanimous consent to insert some matter in the RECORD. I stated that on the last occasion when he made that request he abused his privilege, and I do not intend that he shall do so any more without the express consent of the Senate.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senators from California and Oregon can look at the matter and it can be inserted tomorrow if they find it unobjectionable.

Mr. JOHNSON. It seems to be an article on communism.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I think time can be taken to look at the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the Senate resume legislative session.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 22, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 21, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Lord and our Master, we thank Thee for that love which embodies the heart of the Almighty and which defies all separation. It teaches us that we may receive; but we are to contemplate the noble pleasure of unselfish and righteous conduct. We praise Thee for the historic background and marvelous examples of the prophets, the apostles, and the army of martyrs; they have enriched the soil of the world and they still live, but others are with us. Merciful Father, look upon the obscure folk with loving favor; they have no social, financial, or political magnitude. So often they are tormented with a useless urge to start anew in their bewildering world. They bear the chills of winter, with its bitter sufferings and temptations. Do Thou be unto them as a shadow of a great rock in a weary land, and may they have their recompense and reward. When the evening hour comes may we be something other—bigger, better, worthier, fairer-hearted, and sweeter-hearted. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 18, 1935, was read and approved.

GOVERNOR EARLE PLEDGES A NEW DEAL FOR PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein a speech which I delivered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio broadcast delivered by me January 20, 1935:

Ladies and gentlemen, last week there were two occurrences of great importance to the citizens of this State as well as to the Nation as a whole, and I want to devote my talk this week to these.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON ECONOMIC AND OLD-AGE SECURITY

One was the message of President Roosevelt to the Congress of the United States, outlining the eagerly awaited national program for social and economic security.

I was able to give you the detailed provisions of this program in my talk last Sunday, therefore will not outline them for you again at this time.

The program is of tremendous significance and I shall devote several of my future talks to its various phases. Right now I ask that you bear in mind what I had to say last Sunday in commenting on some of its provisions. I believe—and I am sure that it is the thought of the administration also—that this program is not to be taken as the best we can do for our aged and unemployed. It is rather a beginning—a step forward on the long road we must travel toward economic and social security and happier days.

IMPROVEMENTS AND AMENDMENTS TO THE SECURITY PROGRAM ARE NECESSARY

I believe that the program can be improved, and I shall advocate such improvements. Among other things, I should like to see the old-age benefits begin at 60 instead of 65 years. I should like to see the monthly old-age pension higher than the present $30. I believe that only the smallest possible part of the contribution which will be necessary should be made by the employee, because he must carry the heaviest load of all in these times.

You may be sure that I shall advocate these changes strongly and press for their enactment. I hope I shall meet with some measure of success, and, as I have said, I shall report to you quite frequently on my progress.

A PENNSYLVANIA EVENT OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE

The second occurrence of importance, which I previously mentioned, did not occur at Washington, yet it bears a direct relation to the program to which we have dedicated ourselves there.

I am speaking now of the inaugural address of the Honorable George H. Earle, who was inducted into office as Governor of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania at Harrisburg last Tuesday—the first Democratic Governor in 40 years. The promise and hope contained in that address make it a truly great human document. For the State of Pennsylvania it is an emancipation proclamation. For the country as a whole it is the clearest and best expression of the purposes and objectives of the new deal that has yet been presented.

It is for these reasons that I ask you to examine it carefully with me now and to note what it can mean for us. We have here not only a specific and admirable plan of action to be undertaken for the betterment of the State but a splendid exposition of the solemn obligations of the Government to those it governs.

GOVERNOR EARLE DEFINES THE NEW RESPONSIBILITIES OF GOVERNMENT

Why is Governor Earle's speech of such great significance?

First, he has committed himself and the officials who will serve under him to a new partnership between the small number who own the larger share of the wealth and means of production of this great State and that infinitely greater number who have made that wealth and production possible. He has sounded a warning to private capital and to private ownership of the means of production, that if they would survive they must recognize, and recognize at once, the sacred rights of the many—of the poor and underprivileged, of the farmer and home owner, of the miner, the clerk, and the small-business man. He has told them that they must change for all time their smug and complacent belief that they are feudal lords, at whose pleasure people survive and prosper or suffer and perish.

EXPLOITATION BY PUBLIC UTILITIES IN PENNSYLVANIA

Governor Earle has expressed himself, without qualification, on the subject of utilities. The people of Pennsylvania have for too long been powerless to take adequate steps against the exploitation which has been ruthlessly practiced by its utility corporations.

I myself have gone into the subject of utilities in Pennsylvania at some length, and many of you are probably familiar with the constant agitation and protests I have made against their practices and policies. I am therefore all the more happy that we can look forward to some change in this terrible set-up and that we can expect a new deal here.

EXPLOITATION BY THE MILK TRUST

I hope that all of you realize the full importance of Governor Earle's remarks regarding the milk situation in the State of Pennsylvania. I am afraid that many have not understood just how acute this problem is in Pennsylvania at the present time, and how directly it affects every inhabitant of the State. We must remember that Pennsylvania is not only a great industrial center; it is also one of the leading agricultural States, and of its farm products milk is the most important. What has happened is that the distribution of milk has to a large extent fallen into the hands of a monopoly which has exercised over it a control and exploitation as strong as anything you can find in industry or in the utilities.

On the one hand they have kept up the prices to the consumer, gouging him for every penny they thought he could pay. On the other hand, they have depressed the prices paid to the farmer to a point where he can make no profit. It is bad enough when grown-ups are cheated, exploited, and robbed, but to make innocent children suffer, so as to pay exorbitant salaries to a few ruthless executives, and to unduly fatten the resources of the unholy Milk Trust, is the limit of human indecency.

We are going to see some memorable and far-reaching changes in this awful situation, and they can come none too soon.

WHY PENNSYLVANIA NEEDS A NEW CONSTITUTION

Governor Earle stresses, and rightly so, the need for early revision of the Pennsylvania constitution. I wonder if all of us realize just how much the progress of this great State of ours has been held back along all lines by its antiquated constitution?

It is not hard to understand why, if one only realizes the specific purposes for which the present constitution was drawn up. It was drawn up to keep reactionary government safe in Pennsylvania. It was drawn up to prevent the passage of any legislation which might bring about even a small measure of social or economic security for the common man. It was drawn up to continue in power a few titans of finance and industry and to increase their privileges and power.

Certainly we want to do away with that. Certainly we want to have another kind of State constitution—one which will be based on the common need and the common good. We want, and shall have, a constitution which will give a much fairer distribution of the burden of taxation than we have at present.

UNFAIR TAXATION IN PENNSYLVANIA—THE UNEQUAL BURDEN ON REAL ESTATE

At this point I should like to give you some specific figures which will amaze you. They are the results of a careful study I recently made of the relative tax burdens borne by the home owner and farm owner and that borne by the holders of personal property in the form of stocks, bonds, and financial holdings.

Under our present system of taxation the home owner and farm owner pays 90 percent of the State's taxes. In Pennsylvania, for the year 1931, which was the last year for which I could obtain complete figures, the total tax levy on real estate for local government, including counties, cities, boroughs, townships, schools, and poor taxes, amounted to $372,000,000. Only $13,000,000 were obtained by the 4-mill tax on personal property. Just think of it! Real estate, $372,000,000; personal property, $13,000,000.

You may be interested, too, in the figures for Allegheny County. For 1934 the taxes assessed against real estate in the county amount to $16,419,000. Those assessed against personal property amount to $1,000,970.

A NEW SYSTEM OF STATE TAXATION, BASED ON ABILITY TO PAY

Here is the great injustice in our present form of taxation. Home owners and farm owners carry almost the whole burden. Personal property, which in this State, as in others, is concentrated in the hands of the few, carries very little. That system, Governor Earle has said, is going to be dumped overboard and in its stead we will have a graduated income tax. Those who can best afford to carry the burden will have to assume it whether they want to or not.

Too, with a new State constitution the State will be able to arrange its finances so that it can borrow in hard times and pay in good times.

PENNSYLVANIA CAN LOOK FORWARD TO BETTER TIMES IF GOVERNOR EARLE IS ENABLED TO REALIZE THESE HIGH IDEALS

My friends, I have, of course, been able to discuss only the high lights of Governor Earle's address. I say to you that if the promise contained in Governor Earle's speech is carried out, if these high aims are realized, George H. Earle will emerge one of the great men of these trying times.

I have every hope that these things will be accomplished. I have met Governor Earle on a number of occasions. I have discussed these problems with him. I have been greatly impressed with his sincerity and understanding. I believe that he is determined to bring these changes about. I believe that he will give every fine quality he has of heart and mind to them. He has courage. He has the will to succeed.

Pennsylvania in the past has not been a happy State. Too many of its legislators have won the dubious distinction of being errand boys for a selfish, privileged few. These have exploited the powers and potentialities of our great State. Mighty industries, wealth-producing mines, and fertile farm lands have been misused to build up a few towering fortunes and financial dynasties at the expense of the 10,000,000 citizens of Pennsylvania. We have done away with all that. We are on a new trail in the Keystone State.

Pioneering until now only in industrial development, henceforth we also lead in social engineering. This is the significance of Governor Earle's speech. This is the path we will tread.

TOWNSEND OLD-AGE PENSION PLAN

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute for the purpose of making a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, there are approximately 20,000,000 individuals who have signed a petition asking Congress to enact the Townsend old-age pension plan. Therefore, in order to present the viewpoint of those millions of petitioners, I request unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes immediately after the reading of the Journal and the conclusion of matters on the Speaker's table on next Tuesday, January 29.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from California whether or not he thinks that any Member of Congress ought to mislead 9,000,000 aged men and women into believing that this Government can pay them and expend $24,000,000,000 a year on old-age pensions when our total income from all revenues last year did not amount to $4,000,000,000? Our entire revenues of this Government last year from all sources amounted to less than $4,000,000,000, which is just one-sixth of what Townsend proposes to spend each year on old-age pensions alone. I know what I am talking about, yet the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] would seek to speak 30 minutes to make 8,000,000 old men and women believe that we could raise $24,000,000,000 merely to pay a pension.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Answering the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], whom I regard as one of the most able of our Representatives in Congress, I would ask him whether or not it is not best to endeavor to do something for our aged citizens, even though, through lack of cooperation, we may fall short of our objective, rather than to turn a deaf ear to them as they plead for relief from the morass of suffering and privation in which they are engulfed?

Mr. BLANTON. I believe that the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] and every other Member here has the right to speak and to be heard on public questions. But the Townsend plan is so absurdly impossible that my position is we ought not to mislead anyone into believing that it has any chance to pass. It has no chance to pass. All of us who know anything about Government finances and taxation realize that.

I am in favor of a sane, sound, possible old-age pension. But all actuaries agree that the Townsend plan will cost $24,000,000,000 each year. Do any of us realize how much is $24,000,000,000? If Dr. Townsend had been born with $24,000,000,000 in cash 500 years before the birth of Christ and had lived through all the centuries since then and he had spent $24,000 every day during every year of that 500 years before Christ, and he had continued to spend $24,000 every day during every year all through the 1,935 years since the birth of Christ, he would still have left unspent out of his original $24,000,000,000 the stupendous sum of $2,669,400,000. All of the governments on earth could not raise an extra $24,000,000,000 per year to save their souls.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL]?

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object. If the gentleman wants to do a futile thing, let him do it.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a cablegram that has just been received from the American Legion at San Juan, P. R.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., January 19, 1935.

Representative IGLESIAS,
Washington, D. C.:

The Lincoln American Legion Post of Puerto Rico, in meeting assembled, resolved to recommend you to ask Congress to approve the soldiers' bonus payments.

RAFAEL RIJOS, Commander.

PERMISSION TO FILE REPORT

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. So far as I am concerned, of course, I will not object to his having any time he desires to file a report; but is the gentleman willing to tell the House now, as long as we are going to take this up tomorrow, and will have no other opportunity to know what the rule is going to be, about what the provisions of that rule will be? Of course, the gentleman knows, because it is already drawn and he is going to have a meeting in a few minutes. Would the gentleman be willing to tell the House now what the provisions of the rule will be?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, the rule has not been adopted, as the gentleman on the minority side has stated. Does the gentleman mean as to the provision for time?

Mr. SNELL. I should like to know what the general provisions of the rule are.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not believe I am able to say what form of rule will be adopted as to provision for time.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman tell us what he proposes to present to the committee?

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will be patient, he will learn the provisions of the rule in about 20 minutes or a half an hour. Could the gentleman restrain himself for, say, a half an hour?

Mr. SNELL. How are we to find out if the gentleman will not tell us at the present time? Let me ask the gentleman a direct question. This is very important and I think we are entitled to know. Is the gentleman going to allow us a motion to recommit or not?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I believe that is always allowed.

Mr. SNELL. It has always been allowed under the provisions and precedents of the House, but it was not allowed us last year, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I think it is fairly safe to say that in all of the rules that I can foresee a motion to recommit would be allowed under the rules.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad to have the gentleman commit himself that far, at least, in regard to this rule.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, is it the purpose of the gentleman to take up the $4,000,000,000 bill tomorrow under the rule?

The SPEAKER. That is the plan.

Mr. MICHENER. Could the gentleman from New York, Chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. O'CONNOR], advise us when we will get a copy of the bill that we are to vote on, so that we will know what we are to vote on under this rule?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand it has been introduced today. Of course, it should be available as soon as it is printed. That should be not later than tomorrow morning, at the latest.

Mr. MICHENER. It will be printed, then, before we vote on it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Michigan has been here long enough to know that he can go upstairs now and look at the bill. He can look at any bill he wants to as soon as it is placed in the basket.

Mr. MICHENER. Has it been placed in the basket yet?

Mr. MAPES. It does not seem to have been placed in the basket yet.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York said that it had been placed in the basket, hence it is available to all Members.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand it is in the basket and that a sufficient number of copies will be available for the 14 members of the Rules Committee immediately.

Mr. SNELL. Could the average Member secure a copy of the bill right now?

Mr. SABATH. Shortly.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for the information that shortly we will have it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It will be available this afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. We certainly will have it before we vote on it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman says it will be available before we vote on it. Will it be available this afternoon so we may have it in time to read it over before we take it up tomorrow?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It should be available to those Members who seek it.

Mr. MICHENER. It cannot be generally available until it is printed, can it? And it cannot be printed before tomorrow morning if it is dropped in the basket now?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand it has been sent to the Printing Office and should be back in the document room in a couple of hours.

Mr. MICHENER. And then will be available to the Members?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, I imagine the document room will furnish copies.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman has a vivid imagination. I wanted direct information.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Michigan knows that these bills are available the moment they are printed. They go to the document room and can be had by any Member who desires them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes in order to explain a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY], by special order, has been given 10 minutes and should be recognized at this time. Unless the gentleman from Indiana wishes to yield to the gentleman from Missouri, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I will yield for the space of 5 minutes. I would rather proceed in proper time, but I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Missouri proceeding for 5 minutes, to be followed by the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures, considerable information comes to me in reference to the activities of national organizations of all characters that are continually making requests of governmental agencies to advance money for the purpose of paying their transportation, lodging, food, and so forth, in order that they may come to Washington in support of or in opposition to legislation pending before Congress, and also matters pending before some of our emergency organizations.

It has also come to my notice that some of the money Congress has appropriated in a lump sum has been used for this purpose.

I have here a resolution which will prohibit in the future the use of any money that Congress appropriates in a lump sum for the payment of transportation, lodging, food, and so forth, of the members of organizations for conventions or assemblages that might want to come to Washington at governmental expense. This resolution protects the appropriations that the Congress has already specifically provided for, and it will prevent the use of moneys now in control of any emergency organizations or any other agency of the Government from being used for this purpose.

The resolution protects, for instance, payments for transportation, and so forth, of citizens' military camps, State and Agriculture Department appropriations for attending conferences, as well as the specific appropriations for the Departments of Commerce and Agriculture for attendance of their officers at meetings of learned societies.

It seems to me if the Government is to furnish any money with which to pay any of the expenses of representatives of such organizations it should be provided for by Congress in the proper way; and I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk be immediately considered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks the immediate consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 118

To prohibit expenditure of any moneys for housing, feeding, or transporting conventions or meetings

Whereas numerous applications are being received from various organizations requesting lodging, food, and transportation for the purpose of holding conventions or meetings at Washington and elsewhere; and

Whereas the expenditure of Government funds for such purposes is against the policy of Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That unless specifically provided by law, no moneys from funds appropriated for any purpose shall be used for the purpose of lodging, feeding, conveying, or furnishing transportation, to any conventions or other form of assemblage or gathering to be held in the District of Columbia or elsewhere. This section shall not be construed to prohibit the payment of expenses of any officer or employee of the Government in the discharge of his official duties.

The President is hereby requested to send a copy of this resolution to the heads of all Government departments and agencies which have been granted lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, to ask a question: If I understand the full purport of this resolution, I think I am very earnestly in favor of it. I did not suppose that even at the present time we were paying the expenses of transportation of various organizations to come to Washington for the purpose of presenting propaganda for their pet projects before committees of Congress or departments of the Government. Has that been the policy?

Mr. COCHRAN. My information is that the officials are just flooded with requests and that there may have been a little money used for this purpose, but I doubt if it was much. I am introducing this joint resolution for the purpose of stopping it altogether.

Mr. SNELL. At the present time it is against the law to do any such thing, is it not?

Mr. COCHRAN. I doubt whether it is against the law as to the lump-sum appropriations. When we make a lump-sum appropriation we throw it wide open.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman knows that as well as I do.

Mr. SNELL. If I understand the principle of the joint resolution the gentleman introduced, I am for it 100 percent. If the gentleman can do something to put into effect a safeguard of this kind, so that nothing along this line can be done, the gentleman will have accomplished something.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am offering this joint resolution today for that very purpose.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does this resolution have the approval of the administration?

Mr. COCHRAN. I am not the spokesman of the administration.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman, when the occasion presents itself tomorrow, at the time consideration is being given to the $4,000,000,000 matter, be willing to embody in that resolution a like provision?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. I doubt whether I will have the opportunity. However, if this resolution passes, I am of the opinion that the Comptroller, who is auditing the accounts, will rule it will apply to the $4,800,000,000 appropriation which comes up tomorrow.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I am not going to object—I should like to inquire whether it would be in order to speak on this resolution. I should like 3 or 4 minutes to speak on this resolution at the present time, or when the gentleman concludes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] will have an hour at his disposal.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have no objection extending to the gentleman from New York 5 minutes, but I told the gentleman from Indiana, who is to speak, I would not consume much time.

Mr. FISH. I am for the gentleman's resolution.

Mr. COCHRAN. I have control over the time.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will have 1 hour.

Mr. COCHRAN. I will yield 5 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how will that resolution affect men like the veterans who come down here and are being taken care of at different places?

Mr. COCHRAN. It will have absolutely no effect on them whatsoever, and there is no desire on the part of anyone to stop the relief work which is being given to the veterans. I would not advocate such a resolution.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Where is this money being spent now that the resolution covers?

Mr. COCHRAN. The Government agencies, emergency agencies, are being flooded with requests from organizations of all character all over the United States to come here at the expense of the Government.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman know of any particular organization that has made such request or that has received money for such purpose?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes. They have come from people advocating old-age pensions, monetary legislation, labor legislation, and unemployment insurance, as well as for national projects considered by the Public Works Administration and Federal Emergency Relief Administration.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Has the Government given any money so far?

Mr. COCHRAN. Some; but this is to prevent it in the future.

Mr. COX. It is not the disposition of the gentleman to give the soldier preferential treatment over the aged?

Mr. COCHRAN. No one asks for preferential treatment. This is simply to prevent any Government official from giving Government money to organizations of any kind who apply for it. It will not in any way affect the veterans to which the gentleman from Wisconsin referred.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri for the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I had no idea that this resolution was coming up today. I think it is a very timely and appropriate resolution.

As I understand it, year before last it cost the Government some $70,000 to house veterans that came here under the auspices very largely of the Workers' Ex-Service Men's League, a Communist organization, and its affiliated groups. I understand that it cost $30,000 last year and it is proposed by the Workers Ex-Service Men's League and the Veterans' Rank and File Committee and Veterans' National Liaison Committee to bring another outfit here within the next few days. I am referring only to that group of veterans dominated by Communists, who have their headquarters in the city of Washington, and who are now instigating another march upon Washington. This movement, I may say, is opposed by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled War Veterans, and all other veteran organizations. These men are now coming into the city and are being sent out into camps at the expense of the Government. All that is asked of them is whether they have an honorable discharge from the Army or Navy. They are not even asked whether they are World War veterans. It will probably cost us another $30,000 or $40,000 to take care of this influx of Communists.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to submit evidence within the next week to the Congress and to the American people that these Communist veterans, most of them members of the Ex-Service Men's League or the Veterans' Rank and File Committee, with their headquarters here in Washington, are receiving subscription to bring these Communist bonus marchers here, and I propose to give the names of those public officials holding high offices under the Democratic administration who have been and are now making contributions to these Communist organizations in order to bring Communists to Washington. I do not believe there will be very many Democrats who will defend any of these officeholders. I propose not only to name them but to give more concrete evidence than just a mere statement on my part.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I may say that I was shocked when this evidence was given to me 48 hours ago that men holding high public office, drawing pay out of the Treasury of the United States and having the confidence of this administration, were deliberately contributing sums from $20 to $100 to these communistic veteran organizations. I believe after I have given the names that it will be time for the Democratic Party, which can handle its own affairs, to clean its own house, because the man that contributes to the Communist is just as bad as the Communist himself, particularly for these purposes. [Applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Why does not the gentleman give the names? I have listened to the gentleman rant about Communists for 2 years, and I have yet to hear a concrete fact.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has never heard me make a misstatement about the Communists in his life, and I do not propose, after 4 years, to begin now.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Why does not the gentleman give us the names?

Mr. FISH. I expect to have photostatic copies of these checks to present to the Congress within the next week, with the amounts and the names, and I shall tell you just who they are. I know every one of them by name.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Why does not the gentleman do it now?

Mr. FISH. Because I prefer to do it in my own way and in my own time with uncontrovertible evidence.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU and Mr. O'MALLEY) there were—ayes 130, noes 3.

So the joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means may have leave to sit during sessions of the House at such times as may be deemed necessary by the committee, during this session of the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 10 minutes.

TWO GREAT CONSTITUTIONAL SAFEGUARDS OF FREE SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the security of our free institutions is based upon two fundamental principles, the inviolate observance of both of which is necessary to safeguard and perpetuate the forms of democracy and free self-government—one is the restrictions of the decentralization of powers to be exercised by administrative officials, and the other is the power of the people reserved to them for exercise by the direct vote.

To this end our forefathers in their wisdom provided in the Constitution or basic law for a government of separated or decentralized powers, a division or separation of jurisdictions for separate exercise and independent administration. One division or separated part was provided to serve as a restraint or check upon other divisions or parts, each part to be exercised and administered in jealous observance of limited jurisdiction to safeguard against abuse and usurpation, under which other like governments had failed and the people deprived of their liberty.

And as a governmental counterpart of the restriction of powers to be exercised to safeguard from usurpation from above, all primary powers were reserved to the people themselves for exercise by the direct vote, to serve as a defense of their right from below.

Upon these two great Gibraltar stones our forefathers built the citadel of self-government, their castle of freedom and human rights, to withstand the waves, winds, and assaults of greed and the thirst for autocratic power. And these two great bulwarks of free institutions have remained as a rock in a weary land, as a shelter in a time of storm, sheltering and protecting the masses from the burdens of the impositions of the few, by restraining the exercise of centralized powers and by safeguarding the direct and positive power of the people.

Our forefathers throwing off the yoke of Old World despotic rule set up and established here a new form of government under our own Constitution, and demonstrated and proved to the world the ability of men to govern themselves, to voice their will and wish, and to determine their own affairs. Yielding to the irresistible moral force and power of our example standing out before the peoples and the nations of the civilized world, monarchies gave way to republics, kingdoms to free institutions, and harsh, despotic rule to more popular and human forms of government. Leading all Central and South America to revolt against and overthrow their kings and establish government like our own for the greater recognition of the rights of men. Leading France and Switzerland across the seas to grant more complete free institutions safeguarding the security of human rights. And finally reaching every government in Europe for more complete recognition of the rights of the individual man.

This new form of government, reserving all primary power in the people, created what is known as a "democracy", meaning the rule of the people, the direct rule of the people, the rule of the people by the direct vote—the fullest measure and application of the principle of self-determination possible and practical under the forms provided. The form of government thereby created, providing for the rule of all the people and not of only a certain special few, declared the wisdom of the multitude and the will of the majority as final and supreme.

But, not satisfied with the security of democracy here in our land, for our own people, nor with the nations following in our example, we entered into a world conflict. We went to war with the nations, at the cost of blood, life, and treasure, and at the hazards of our very existence. We braved the dangers of a treacherous submarine sea. We fought from the shell-swept trenches of France. We charged over the top in the face of fire and into the very jaws of death. We advanced, groping our way through the Argonne Woods. We battled on to claim victory along the shell-torn battle fronts of Europe. We took our position to stay and stop the mad, on-rushing armies of Von Hindenburg, Ludendorff, and Moltke, advancing in an avalanche of fire and steel, driving, surging on to conquer Paris and the allied armies of defense, all to make the world safe for democracy, which we had cradled in our own land and by our example led the nations to follow.

But in this evil hour of our history and the history of the free institutions designing, assuming, autocratic rulers and ambitious premiers of the Old World, looking always for opportunity to take advantage of some crisis or condition of the people, are making claim and taking over greater and extraordinary powers, assuming as necessary, imperative, and required to meet and cope with the conditions of the times—social, economic, and industrial conditions—brought on by the panic and depression. And the spirit of arbitrary powers assumed over individual rights and local affairs has been lifted in the horizon of the Old World and is reflecting back across the sea as a prestige for like claim here to meet our own social and economic conditions under the continuance of this depression.

Unconsciously or unwittingly mistaking the cause and misapprehending the remedy, public officials are yielding and allowing the examples and claims of Old World premiers to prompt and inspire them in like claim here for the exercise of special and extraordinary powers to meet and cope with the conditions of the panic where none are needed, necessary, or required.

Our own Nation, which led the world by the moral force of our example to adopt the forms of our democracy and free institutions, is being led back in ignominious retreat, humiliating, irreconcilable, and contradictory in the course of international relations, retracting from and compromising our exalted position. And yielding to Old World precedents and the strain of economic depression we are surrendering up and breaking down the safeguards of democracy at home in our own land for which we went to war to uphold and for which to make the world safe and secure we battled from the shell-swept trenches of Europe.

And the compromise of constitutional safeguards enjoining the separate exercise of power following the example of Old World premiers and to appease and in obedience to reactionary demands, the movement is being carried even farther and for the suppression of the direct vote of the people by demanding a repeal of the direct primary.

Great national calamities and wide-spread misfortunes and disasters, which divert the attention of the people and throw them off their guard, are seized upon as an opportunity for advantage to claim and take powers which at other times would not be assumed nor their exercise even attempted. The calamity and disaster of this depression is not different from other great misfortunes affording such opportunity for advantage. The claim for the exercise of extraordinary powers would not have at other times been claimed as the Hoover administration was led to claim in the reciprocal Tariff Act of 1930 and as this administration has been led to follow in the reciprocal tariff provision of 1934. And the movement to take from and deprive the people of the direct and positive power reserved to them under the Constitution would never have been proposed or attempted under prosperous and normal conditions with the attention of the people left undiverted to guard their rights in peace and civil life.

With the people today suffering and in distress and crying out for relief from the burdens of the panic and depression, willing and ready to yield up at any cost, price, or sacrifice their birthright or inheritance for a mere mess of pottage of partial and temporary relief, the time was most propitious and opportune to break in, pillage, and vandalize our free competitive system of industry and to plunder in the name and form of relief and recovery from the depression, as well as to enter the doors of free self-government and to rob the people of their vested powers by the direct vote.

The harsh and summary proceedings which society usually vindictively deals out to vandals following in the wake of great calamities is not urged or recommended inflicted here upon the claimants of extraordinary powers or the men conspiring to take away the primary. Yet the attempt to take away from the people their direct and positive powers, especially reserved to them as voters, taking advantage of their suffering and distress, should be condemned and resented in no uncertain words and terms. And the incident should be made the occasion for the people to demand and recover back their full rights and powers, as voters, to choose all candidates for office at primary elections, provided and safeguarded by the same direct and positive powers of the people, assured in the final election of public officials.

The direct primary laws in the several States were enacted to free the voters from and to lift and remove the burdens and impositions imposed under boss-rule convention systems and to give the honest, modest, earnest voter, the helpless, dependent individual man, a voice in directing his Government and the administration of public affairs. And the poll of the Governors of the several States where the primary is provided shows a consistent adherence to the principle and endorsement and approval of the law and a determination to maintain the primary as a part of the electorate system of the State in good-faith observance and in obedience to the fundamental principles of free institutions. To repeal the primary law now would bring a return of all the evils of legislation and the administration of government from which it was enacted to eradicate, now more intolerable than ever before, and would mark a backward movement and the most reactionary step taken in repudiation of the fundamental principles realized in the last 100 years.

There is no other public occasion which so appeals to the people, arousing a sense of public interest in the administration of the Government, a realization of public duty enjoined upon them and to keep alive the spirit of patriotism, as the opportunity afforded and safeguarded to express and have their will registered as a citizen of the land at the primary. Aside from the observance of a vital principle fundamental in our system of free institutions and necessary to maintain and perpetuate the forms of our free self-government, the institution of the direct primary, the opportunity open to every man and woman to express and register their will, is worth many times the cost in money to keep alive and maintain the spirit of the loyal and patriotic duty of the people.

The orderly conduct of the primary safeguarded by the Australian election law, the general and considerate observance of the day by men and women voters in a spirit of pride and reverence in going to and returning from the polls in the exercise of their right of citizenship, is an inspiring example of public duty, prompting and maintaining the patriotic spirit of the people. All this is in striking contrast with the secret strategies and intrigue, the cunning scramble for delegate's proxies, the sparring for position and advantage, the secret wire-pulling manipulations to coerce and mislead the timid and inexperienced and is in disparagement of public duty and interest. The high-handed, boss-rule domination and the log-rolling, steam-roller methods of party-convention proceedings and the manipulations by a certain special few, serve only to discourage and repel honest voters and to turn them away from participation in elections, from manifesting interest and concern in public questions, and to discredit our own form of institutions before the electorate and the people as a sham, a delusive claim, and mere pretense.

Under the theory of our free institutions, originally all power, by natural right, was vested in the people for exercise by direct vote. But in the organization of the Government through the adoption of the Constitution the people, for convenience and facility of action, surrendered and delegated a part of their powers vested in them over to legislative bodies, to courts, and administrative officials. In making such delegation of powers the people reserved to themselves what they believed was sufficient power, and which at the time was sufficient power to maintain their control of public affairs.

But under new and changed conditions, social, economic, and industrial conditions, the people have since come to realize that the powers reserved were not adequate or sufficient to enable them to safeguard their rights and control the administration of public affairs. And to meet these and new changed conditions and to resist the encroachment of corporate powers, the concentration of wealth in a few, and great combinations of capital, the organization of supercorporations rivaling its power of the Government itself, and to direct legislation and public affairs, the people have since entered upon a movement to recover back a part and measure of the powers so surrendered and delegated to legislative bodies, courts, and administrative officials for exercise themselves by a direct vote.

One of the powers originally vested in the people and surrendered to State legislatures on the adoption of the Constitution and which under new and changed conditions the people have since realized the necessity of recovering for exercise by direct vote was the power to elect United States Senators. Under these new and changed conditions the United States Senate was fast becoming an exclusive, autocratic, aristocratic body irresponsive to the will of the people and with the proceedings of that body being condemned and characterized as "the treason of the Senate." That the people have not mistaken their remedy in resorting to the direct vote in the election of United States Senators to eradicate the evils and abuses suffered is shown by the fact that even before the constitutional amendment went into effect recovering that power to the people and on mere anticipation looking to the change, the Senate took on a new policy and has become more progressive than the House.

Every reason which existed for the amendment recovering back the election of United States Senators and every reason which exists today for the final election of United States Senators by the direct vote at the general election exist today, with equal force and effect for the nomination of United States Senators by the direct vote. The right to choose between candidates at the general and final elections held will avail the people little or nothing if they are not allowed to select the candidates between whom they must choose and for whom they are compelled to vote. If the people are denied the right or opportunity to choose candidates for whom they must vote, and a certain special select few men are left to dictate and name the candidates for whom the people must and can only vote, the direct election of candidates for office becomes a meaningless and empty form.

And with the movement to recover back powers surrendered under the Constitution, the people have come to realize the necessity under new and changed economic conditions, of exercising a greater measure of direct power which they had retained to themselves but to which they had not before resorted. And under such new and changed conditions the people have further realized the necessity of choosing their candidates for office to be voted for, as well as of choosing between candidates at elections, and that without this power their will can be completely thwarted and their choice nullified and be of no avail.

The repeal of the direct primary is now urged because of the cost of the primary, as well as upon the further grounds that the people cannot become acquainted with the men aspiring as candidates and are incapable of judging of their fitness and qualifications. Every reason and ground which can be urged and exists for the direct election of candidates applies with equal force and effect to the direct nomination of candidates. And every reason urged against the direct nomination of candidates can be urged with equal force against the direct election of public officials. If the direct primary is to be repealed because of the cost of holding the primary, then the direct-election laws should be repealed to save the cost and expense of holding the final elections. If a certain special few selected delegates can become better acquainted and more familiar and can better judge of the qualifications of men to be selected as candidates, then a certain special few men can become more familiar with the candidates and can better judge of and exercise a choice between the different candidates at election and the whole principle of direct election fails.

The will of the majority of the people is not expressed in party conventions. The honest, earnest, and unassuming voter is not given a free opportunity to express his will and choice for candidates nor to voice his will and preference for policies of government in the manipulative proceedings of conventions. The honest, confident individual man, earnest and ambitious to discharge his public duty, is compelled to sit in political conventions bewildered and confused by juggling tactics, while high-powered politicians and henchmen proceed to marshal delegates and proxies and pull the wires and strings and control both nominations and platform pledges.

All just election laws are fundamentally designed to carry out the principles of self-government and make effective the rule of the people and to restrain the certain special few from manipulation and control of the many. And without the direct primary law to safeguard first, the selection of candidates for whom and only for whom the people can vote, the direct vote of the people at elections is made a farce, pretense, and a delusion. All just election laws are designed to protect and safeguard the common, honest, confiding man, the earnest, dependent, individual voter, who is ambitious to discharge his duty, to express his will and wish, to direct at legislation and the administration of public affairs. Just and fair election laws are not intended to add to the power and opportunity of the shrewd, crafty, and resourceful nor to increase and augment such powers to thwart the will and exercise greater control over their confiding, unsuspecting fellow men.

It is true that some men may be better informed than other men and may possess superior powers of judgment and be more experienced than other men, may be able to become better acquainted and familiar and to better judge of the fitness and qualifications of men offering themselves for nomination as candidates. But our system of government is founded upon the principle and theory, and which principle and theory is right, that no man possesses such great mental powers nor such superior judgment, capacity, or discretion as to enable him to think and judge for another man, or to tell another man what he likes best, or how he loves to live, or the course of life he best enjoys.

All the wars of the world have been fought, all the revolutions of time have been organized, to resist the claim of one man assuming greater knowledge, or superior judgment, or greater opportunity, or experience in government, to tell another man how he should live or what he likes or loves best, which every man is entitled under every principle of natural right to claim and determine for himself.

The claim has been made in justification of the right of the few to govern and rule over the many that the few are informed and know better than the many know what is best for themselves. This claim is a subterfuge as old as human history; every man who has enslaved another man has enslaved him under the claim that it was to better the condition of the enslaved. Every nation which has conquered and subjugated a defenseless people has conquered and subjugated it under the claim that it was to improve the condition of the helpless, dependent, resisting conquered.

It is true that men are liable to make mistakes against themselves. But it is also true of men that they are not liable to make more mistakes against themselves as others make against them following the impulse of self-interest. It is also true that if men do make mistakes against themselves, as claimed, they are more likely to correct their mistakes than others making the mistakes against them will rectify the mistakes and give up the advantages gained.

If the principle of free institutions is not right, if the claim of free self-government is an error, a mere shadowy, visionary theory, without practical application in fact, then let us supplant and supersede free government and the farce of declaring the will of the people and suppress and end the right of men to will and determine for themselves how they best love to live, move, and have their being. Then, to be consistent and devoid of pretense, let us change the form of our Government, take away the pretense of power inherent in the people to rule, and substitute in its place instead the superior wisdom of the certain special few and apologize to the spirit of King George for the error of the American Revolution.

DEFINITION OF "DISAGREEMENT", THE WORLD WAR VETERANS' ACT, 1924

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 112, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 112

Resolved, etc., That a denial of a claim for insurance by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs or any employee or agency of the Veterans' Administration heretofore or hereafter designated therefor by the Administrator shall constitute a disagreement for the purposes of section 19 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 38, sec. 445). This resolution is made effective as of July 3, 1930, and shall apply to all suits now pending against the United States under the provisions of section 19 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and any suit which has been dismissed solely on the ground that a denial as described in this resolution did not constitute a disagreement as defined by section 19 may be reinstated within 3 months from the date of enactment of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This is a rather comprehensive proposition to be brought up suddenly at this time. I think the gentleman should explain the situation and tell the House what it is before consent is given.

Mr. RANKIN. I shall be glad to do that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Mississippi will be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the request of the distinguished gentleman from New York is a very reasonable one, and I shall comply with it. Under the law passed in 1930 amending the World War Veterans' Act of 1924, it was provided:

> * * * And the term "disagreement" means the denial of a claim by the Director or someone acting in his name on an appeal to the Director.

A veteran named Frederick filed suit on one of these insurance claims. The circuit court, the court of original jurisdiction, held that there had been no disagreement as contemplated by this law, for the reason that it did not come from the Director of the Veterans' Administration himself. Frederick appealed to the circuit court of appeals, and the circuit court of appeals certified the case to the Supreme Court of the United States.

The conclusion of the brief of the Government's representative in the Supreme Court, which is over the signature of the Solicitor General and others, states in part:

> * * * There is, we believe, grave doubt as to the correctness of the opinion of the Acting Attorney General—

He refers to an opinion handed down by the Acting Attorney General several years ago, to the effect that a representative of the Veterans' Bureau could enter the disagreement contemplated by the statute.

This case is now before the Supreme Court. It was argued on October 18, and on November 5 the motion was made by the Solicitor General to defer the matter until Congress could clarify this law. That motion was sustained. The Solicitor General in that motion says:

> Since the argument in this case this Department has reached the conclusion that an effort should be made to secure from Congress at its next session in January, legislation having for its object the removal of any question as to the jurisdiction of the district court in these and other cases instituted under similar circumstances, ratifying the action of the Administrator. I am authorized to say that the Veterans' Administration will seek the necessary legislation.

The Veterans' Administration did come and ask for this legislation and submitted this report on the case. The joint resolution was prepared and introduced, submitted to the Solicitor General, and has his approval. I called the Veterans' Affairs Committee together last week. We went over the joint resolution and it was unanimously reported. I submitted it to the ranking minority member, Mrs. ROGERS, from Massachusetts, a few moments ago. She said it was all right to take it up for passage. The reason we are asking that it be done now is that the Supreme Court is holding this case in abeyance, and has been now for more than 2 months. I am sure there will be no opposition to it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What will be the practical effect in the administration of the Veterans' Bureau affairs if this resolution be agreed to?

Mr. RANKIN. It will be this: The Administrator's representative can disagree on one of these insurance cases, and then if the applicant is dissatisfied he can go ahead and file his suit. General Hines states in this letter that he does not have any exact figures as to the cost of this resolution, but my recollection is he assured me there are less than 100 cases which would come under it.

Mr. SNELL. If this goes through, the matter will not be opened up so that it will run into a million dollars or so?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, no.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman does not believe this will apply to very many cases, and it will not have the disastrous effect upon the claims of some of these soldiers that some of the newspapers seem to think?

Mr. RANKIN. No. My recollection is that General Hines told me there would be less than 100 cases affected by it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does not the gentleman think that case was a flimsy case?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know. I am rather of the opinion, and thought all the time, that it was the intention of Congress that disagreement by a representative of the Veterans' Administration meant a disagreement under this law, and I have thought that the soldiers' claims should at least have gone to trial.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. In a case like this involved in our Federal district court, we had there a letter from a Mr. McCoy, director of insurance. The Government took the position that that letter must be signed by the director, and Mr. McCoy signing and sending out that letter did not meet the requirement of the act. This is to correct that very condition, as I understand it.

Mr. RANKIN. That is what it does. It corrects that very condition. There are probably a hundred of those cases where the director himself did not sign the disagreement, and they have gone on now to the point where, if this case should be decided against this young man, they would lose their rights, as a result of no shortcoming or misconduct of their own.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this involved the jurisdiction of the United States district court and their right to try these insurance cases?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, sir; that is just about what is involved.

Mr. HEALEY. And this clarifies the situation?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; this clarifies the situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE FAR EAST

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 25 minutes on the Far East.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, for the purpose of asking a question, is there any more business to come before the House this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of none.

Mr. SNELL. It is expected we will adjourn after this speech?

The SPEAKER. That is the present expectation, although I do not know.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker, in the midst of prevailing international confusion in the world and in the Far East in particular, it is a painful duty to discuss the Philippine question as arranged by Public Act No. 127, Seventy-third Congress, commonly known as the "Tydings-McDuffie law." At the time of its formulation and adoption the conditions existing the world over were quite different from what they are now. The sponsors of the Tydings-McDuffie law gave their best thoughts to solve the Philippine problem in a way compatible with the responsibilities of the United States and to the best interests of the Filipino people. I am, therefore, pleased to acknowledge that the Seventy-third Congress, in passing Act 127, was moved by the loftiest ideals and the best sentiment toward the Filipino people. During the discussion of the Tydings-McDuffie law before the Committees on Insular Affairs of the House and of the Senate, many called the attention of those committees to the wisdom and justice of some of its provisions. The sponsors and supporters of the Tydings-McDuffie law did their best to meet those objections satisfactorily, but at that time they were confronted with conditions and circumstances which compelled them to support the law as it is now.

The provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie law that were strongly objected to were those which referred to the economic phases of the bill. This part of the law is most important if the United States is willing, as she is, to create in the Far East either an independent nation or a self-governing country. Also, it becomes more important if the United States is willing, as I know she is, to preserve in the Philippine Islands the lives of 14,000,000 Christian people and their occidental civilization. The economic structure of the Philippine Islands is inevitably linked with its standard of culture and civilization. It is the only place in the Far East which may be fairly regarded as the dyke that will hold back the tide of the Asiatic seas. Bear in mind that this dyke was built first by Spain and rebuilt and strengthened by the United States, thus making the destiny of the Filipino people tightly interwoven with that of the United States.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield now or would he rather yield later?

Mr. GUEVARA. I yield now.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman tell the House what percentage of the products of the Philippines the United States buys?

Mr. GUEVARA. About 87 percent.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman tell the House what percentage of the Philippine trade in textiles a year ago was bought in the United States?

Mr. GUEVARA. In 1933, 54 percent in round figures.

Mr. FISH. And will the gentleman tell the House what it is today?

Mr. GUEVARA. Oh, it has decreased to about 60 percent now of its former value.

Mr. FISH. Is it not less than that now?

Mr. GUEVARA. Sixty percent. It has been reduced 15 percent in the last 6 months.

Mr. FISH. It has been reduced 15 percent in the last 6 months. Why?

Mr. GUEVARA. The Philippine Legislature wanted to amend the tariff law of the Philippines to protect the American textile trade in the islands, but for some reason beyond its control they have not been able to amend that tariff law. Therefore, the Japanese textile business is now invading the Philippines to the detriment of the American textile business in the islands.

Mr. FISH. And if it continues, it will take practically all the textile business?

Mr. GUEVARA. It will wipe out entirely the American textile business.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman know what the objection to the Filipino law was and where it came from?

Mr. GUEVARA. I will insert an editorial published by the Washington Herald a week ago at the conclusion of my speech. The House will be informed by that editorial.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact that the State Department objected to the Philippine Congress protecting the American textile industry?

Mr. GUEVARA. That is a very embarrassing question. [Laughter.]

In addition to this, the orientation of the social, educational, and political life of the Filipino people has been definitely influenced by American principles and institutions. This Nation has implanted in that overseas possession the fundamentals of her democratic institutions and the mentality of the Filipino people is closely patterned after them. For this reason it becomes the privilege and responsibility of the statesmen of the United States and the constructive patriotism of the Filipino people to see to it that the cultural traits of more than 300 years are not crushed overnight.

Realizing that such responsibilities and obligations rest upon the American and Filipino people alike, President Roosevelt in his message to Congress on March 2, 1934, said:

> Where imperfections or inequalities exist, I am confident that they can be corrected after proper hearing and in fairness to both people.

Indications are that the economic provisions of the Tydings-McDuffie law will catapult the Filipino people into hardships and difficulties and completely destroy their economic structure. When these sad days come, then it will amount to a defeat of the aims and purposes of the Tydings-McDuffie law. The best interests of the Filipino people will not have been protected and the responsibilities of this great Nation will not have been discharged, thus opening the avenue for some selfish nation to take advantage of the opportunity and gobble up the 114,000 square miles of fertile soil, and by natural process of attrition, assimilation, and penetration extinguish a race of 14,000,000 Christian people.

The excise tax of 3 cents per pound on coconut oil coming to the United States has the effect of paralyzing that industry in the Philippine Islands, thus throwing into unemployment millions of people who now find themselves destitute. One-third of the population of the Philippine Islands depends upon this industry for its livelihood, and its dislocation will certainly cause social and economic commotion in the Philippine Islands.

The sugar industry is also finding itself in dire straits. All of these economic calamities which have been aggravated by a series of devastating typhoons are to no advantage to the United States. This Nation is still importing sugar from abroad in order to meet the requirements of its markets. No substitute has as yet been discovered for the coconut oil used in the soap industry. The assumption that the coconut oil coming from the Philippines represents competition to the dairy farmers has no foundation in fact. Statistics prove beyond a doubt that the Philippine coconut oil used for edible purposes is very much less in value than what the Philippine buys from the American farmers. Curtailment at this time of the existing free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands would be an opportunity for some nation in the Far East to absorb the economic system of the islands. If this eventuality occurs, it would be only a question of time when we will witness American trade in the Philippines and in the Far East wiped out completely without the corresponding returns.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GUEVARA. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman put in the total amount of the American trade?

Mr. GUEVARA. I will put in the RECORD the figures at the end of my speech.

May I emphasize the fact that economically the United States and the Philippines complement each other.

The Filipino people are willing to do their part in this connection. Our legislature in its past session considered amending the Philippine tariff law in order to protect American trade in the islands, but for reasons beyond its control it has been unable to do so.

Now permit me to discuss the international situation of the Philippines as arranged by the Tydings-McDuffie law. President Roosevelt in his message to Congress on March 2, 1934, said the following:

> In keeping with the principles of justice and in keeping with our traditions and aims, our Government for many years has been committed by law to ultimate independence for the people of the Philippine Islands whenever they should establish a suitable government capable of maintaining that independence among the nations of the world.

I consider it my sacred duty to call attention to the fact that when the President sent that message to Congress the international conditions warranted such a statement. At that time the denunciation of the Washington Treaty and the treaty between the United States and other nations to respect the territorial integrity of their respective territories and insular possessions in the Pacific had not taken place. The former possessions of Germany in the Pacific, which are now under the mandate of a certain nation on behalf and under the authority of the League of Nations, were not known to have been fortified, and no one suspected that said mandatory power would refuse to surrender these possessions to the League of Nations once she had severed her connections and relations with that institution.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the fact that, the United States not being a member of the League of Nations, the discussion of this affair on the floor of the House appears irrelevant. However, I cannot refrain from stating facts and from laying them before the American people for the reason that section 11 of the Tydings-McDuffie law, Public Act 127, Seventy-third Congress, provides that—

> The President is requested, at the earliest practicable date, to enter into negotiations with foreign powers with a view to the conclusion of a treaty for the perpetual neutralization of the Philippine Islands, if and when Philippine independence shall have been achieved.

At this juncture I recall that the nations of the world committed themselves in solemn treaty to respect and preserve the political independence and the territorial and administrative integrity of the Republic of China. Also the treaty concluded between Japan and Great Britain, committing themselves to respect and preserve the independence and territorial integrity of Korea, comes to mind. Hardly threescore years have elapsed since the execution of these treaties and the world has seen them violated flagrantly, thus rendering useless the blood shed by the youth of all nations of the world on the battlefields of Europe.

The Kellogg Pact, which outlawed war as an instrument of national policy, can now be considered dead. The invasion of Manchucuo and Shanghai, which caused diplomatic disturbances all over the world, is still fresh in the memory of all students of history.

Right on the floor of this House, Mr. Speaker, I said, when addressing the Seventy-third Congress, that—

> The establishment of American sovereignty over the Philippine Islands was not founded upon the simple issue of whether independence should be granted. If the grant of independence were the only basis of the American occupation of the Philippines, it could have been accomplished either before the ratification of the Treaty of Paris between Spain and the United States or after its ratification—thus responding to the clamoring and petitioning of the Filipino people. The United States, however, time and again denied the grant of that independence upon the grounds that she had a mission to fulfill in the Philippine Islands in line with the obligations she assumed before the world.

There is nothing in the past to be regretted. We are facing the future with confidence, taking into consideration the solemn commitments made by the constitutional leaders of the American people.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If the gentleman feels at liberty to answer, I should like to ask him whether there has been a change in the sentiment of the Philippine Islands regarding the question of their ultimate and complete independence of the United States since the passage of the last Philippine independence act by Congress?

Mr. GUEVARA. The sentiment of the Philippine people right at this moment is that they look at Japan as a real menace to Philippine independence. In this connection I wish to state that when the Japanese vice consul at Manila justified the big holdings of the Japanese in Davao and their investment in the Philippine Islands, he said that whether or not such holdings and investments would be a menace to Philippine independence was up to the Filipinos themselves, implying, "If you please us, you can have independence like Manchuria; if not, you know what is coming to you."

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should like to ask the gentleman another specific question. He is at liberty to answer or not; he knows better than I whether he should or not. I should like to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, the future welfare of the Philippine Islands will be best conserved by their ultimate and complete independence from the United States, or by maintaining relationship with the United States?

Mr. GUEVARA. The best interests of the Philippines, the United States, and the whole world will be better served with an American protectorate of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If the gentleman will yield for a further question, is the view of the gentleman and the view of the Philippine people as just expressed by him based upon political or economic considerations?

Mr. GUEVARA. It is based upon the safety of the Philippine Islands. In this matter we do not consider either the economic or the political situation.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman is not considering them separately?

Mr. GUEVARA. No.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman is not just looking at coconut oil and sugar?
